The defender reclaimed.

The arguments fully appear from the Lord Ordinary's opinion and the opinions of the Court.[1] pursuer, or he might, without granting an express extension, acquiesce in the defender removing the timber after the expiration of the agreed-on time. It appears to me that as the defender had undoubtedly acquired the timber by purchase, he must be taken to be in the lawful exercise of his rights in removing it, so long as he was allowed to do so without objection on the part of Lord Herries.

"The next and only other general question is one which is raised in the interest of the defender. It is contended on his behalf that the acts of pollution averred and proved do not constitute an infringement of the law of neighbourhood. If the defender is not a trespasser, he is only responsible, as it seems, for the observance of the law of neighbourhood: hence it is urged that the acts complained of do not give rise to an action unless they amount to a nuisance. It must be admitted that the fouling of a stream by dragging fallen timber across it would not amount to a nuisance; but I cannot accept the defender's view that an injury done to a neighbour is not actionable unless it amounts to a nuisance. The obligation of neighbourhood is expressed in the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. A supply of pure water is essential to the pursuer's business; the pollution of the streams which feed his hatcheries was calculated to destroy the whole produce of his undertaking for the year. Assuming (but only for the purpose of testing the argument) that this was known to the defender, I conceive that the obligation of neighbourhood required the defender to use a reasonable degree of care and trouble to avoid injurious pollution.

"There are then three points for consideration with reference to the alleged injuries:—

"(1) Was the defender made aware of the injury which the temporary fouling of the water would cause to the hatcheries?

"(2) Was it possible by the use of reasonable and inexpensive expedients to avoid the fouling of the water?

"(3) Was the defender negligent in the performance of the duty of taking reasonable care to avoid fouling the water?

"These questions will be considered with reference to the facts as proved.

"I may here observe that I do not hold it proved that the defender had been made aware, before 30th December 1886, of the necessity of using means to avoid the pollution of the streams which fed the pursuer's establishment.

"There is evidence that the defender and his son (who was in charge of the timber) had separately visited the pursuer and seen the fish-hatchery. But these were visits of a friendly character, and the hatchery was most probably shewn to the defender and his son just as it might have been shewn to any member of the public attracted by curiosity or scientific interest. If the attention of the defender and his son had been drawn to the subject, they might, no doubt, have inferred that pure water was necessary. But they were not naturalists, nor were they persons conversant with fishing or fish-culture. Therefore, it is not to be assumed that they ever thought of the quality of the water. They probably saw the filters; but these might only suggest that the pursuer had the means of protecting his hatchery from the effects of pollution. In point of fact, the filters are only efficacious against such pollution as results from natural causes—a heavy shower, for example, washing a certain amount of turbid water into the stream. But if the water is mixed with any considerable amount of soil or mud, the filters become choked, and the water flows over the frames instead of passing through them. The pursuer states that when he shewed the defender the hatchery he spoke of the necessity of having pure water, and requested the defender to use means of avoiding pollution. The defender denies that such communications were made to him. As the evidence on this point is conflicting, I think it is best to assume it as unproved that the defender or his son were originally made aware of the requirements of the hatchery or of the injurious effects which would follow from the temporary pollution of the water.

"On the morning of the 30th December 1886, the pursuer, on proceeding to inspect his hatchery, found that the water flowing into it was fouled with mud, that the filters were choked, and the muddy water flowing over the frames into the hatchery, forming a muddy deposit on the fish ova. The pursuer did what was possible to clean the ova; but notwithstanding his endeavours they were to a large extent lost, their vitality being destroyed by the muddy deposit which prevented the access of fresh aerated water which is necessary to their development. The pursuer immediately saw the defender's son, and informed him of the mischief that had been done. The pursuer says that it was eventually arranged that during the ensuing week, the weather being frosty, the defender should proceed with the removal of the timber, as it was considered that when the ground was hard there would be little disturbance of the soil by dragging the timber across or in the neighbourhood of the stream. Assuming that this was so, the defender did not keep to the arrangement, but on the 3d January 1887, during a heavy fall of rain, he continued the work at the same place, with the result that the filters were again choked, and what remained of the ova and the young fry were completely destroyed. The pursuer purchased a fresh supply of ova, for which he paid £58, 10s. I am of opinion that the defender is excusable for the injury done on the 30th December, but not for what was done on 3d January. He ought either to have suspended the work during the thaw, or have laid down a bridge of logs over the water-course, for which materials lay ready to hand, or at the least he ought to have consulted the pursuer, and given him the opportunity of making a log bridge, or doing what was necessary to preserve the water from contamination.

"On the occurrence of this second injury, the pursuer again remonstrated; and this time he indicated that he would apply to Lord Herries or his factor to have the removal of the timber stopped, unless some arrangement was made. Lord Herries had the means of putting pressure on the defender, because the latter had exceeded the time allowed by his contract. But it was not necessary to refer to Lord Herries or the factor, because the defender's son agreed to defer the removal of the timber from this part of the plantation until the middle of March, when it was understood that the fish would be fully hatched, and the risk of injury much lessened.

"I may here explain that the pursuer makes use of two small streams coming from the plantation. The stream already referred to flows direct into the hatchery, and thence into one of the fish-ponds. It is referred to in the evidence and argument by the name of the Hatchery Stream. The remaining fish-ponds are supplied by the other small stream known as Tannox Burn. The arrangement of the ponds and their feeders is shewn in a plan which the pursuer gave in at the proof.

"Before the next pollution complained of, the pursuer had made a change in his arrangements, and his whole establishment, including the hatchery, was then supplied from the second stream. What was the reason for this change does not clearly appear; but I understand it was done to enable the defender to remove what remained of the timber without taking precautions against polluting the 'Hatchery Stream.' All the timber had to be taken across the Hatchery Stream, and it would have been difficult, even if bridges had been constructed, has decided in favour of the pursuer, who is a cultivator of fish near Dumfries and has established a hatchery on the lands of Lord Herries in the neighbour-to avoid causing some pollution. It was necessary, however, that part of the timber should be taken across the small rills which flow into the Tannox Burn, and it was supposed that by forming log bridges across these the amount of pollution would be so small that when mixed with the larger volume of water in the Tannox Burn it would be rendered insensible. I think that counsel on both sides are agreed that this would be so.

"I now come to the 7th of March, when, according to what I hold was the arrangement between the parties, the removal of the timber was to be recommenced. On the 8th March the pursuer observed that the water coming into the hatchery and pond was discoloured. This was found to be caused by the dragging of timber across one of the rills that flow into the Tannox Burn. At the pursuer's request, the defender, who happened to be on the spot, at once agreed to place planks or logs across the rill; and over such an extemporised bridge the rest of the timber in that part of the plantation was drawn, and damage avoided. No serious damage resulted from the slight disturbance to the water in the morning; partly because the disturbance was stopped before it had time to take effect upon the habitants of the hatchery and pond; and also because the fry were so far advanced that they could be cleaned by washing in pure water.

"Matters went smoothly, with one exception, which I do not stop to narrate, until 1st April, when a further pollution of the Tannox Burn took place, alleged by the pursuer to be the most serious of all; and according to his evidence it destroyed the whole of the fish of that year's hatchery. On 1st April the defender's work-people had cleared the timber so far up the bank that it now became necessary to cross two other rills feeding the Tannox Burn. They formed no log bridges, took no precautions of any kind, and gave no notice to the pursuer to protect himself. They commenced at an early hour in the morning to drag the timber across the two tributary rills, the banks of which were trodden into mud by the men and horses engaged in the work. The mud of course went down the Tannox Burn into the hatchery. The pollution was not discovered by the pursuer until its effects were irremediable. All the young fry died, with the exception of about 2000, which were chiefly from the lot of ova which had been bought in January to replace those that were first destroyed. According to the pursuer's evidence, which on this point is not open to criticism, he and his men spent weeks in tending and cleaning the ova and young fry, in the hope of removing the effects of the flooding of 8th March and 1st April; but their efforts were unavailing. The pursuer evidently thinks the flooding which took place on the 1st April was the more injurious of the two, and has no doubt that the destruction of the ova is attributable to the inflow of muddy water. I think that his conclusion is in entire accordance with the facts of the case.

"Besides the destruction of the young fry, the pursuer also claims damages for the destruction of fish in certain of the ponds into which water runs from the hatchery. The fish in these ponds were attacked by fungus disease, which the pursuer attributes to organic impurities coming from the hatchery, which of course contained a certain amount of putrescent matter coming from the dead fry or ova. The fish in ponds which are not supplied with water through the hatchery were not affected by the disease. It is therefore probable that the mortality amongst the grown fish is in some way attributable to the water connection between the hatchery and the ponds in which these fish were contained. But assuming the correctness of the pursuer's explanation, and the soundness of the corroborative evidence given by Mr Chambers on this subject, it only proves to my mind that it was a bad arrangement ever to allow the ponds to be supplied with water passing through the hatchery. It is agreed that the mortality among the young fry is always considerable, and therefore the risk of disease spreading to the fish exists independently of the exceptional mortality among the fry which occurred in the 1887 season. I suppose that the pursuer's men would hood of a wood which has given rise to the dispute here. His complaint is that in the course of carrying away the timber off the adjoining lands the defender, who is a wood contractor, and who is under contract with Lord Herries to clear the wood, has fouled the rivulets which feed the hatchery, and that the result of that, continued over a considerable period of time, has been to cause great damage to the article of commerce in which the pursuer is engaged.

I own to feeling great regret for the loss, which, as far as the pursuer is concerned, has been considerable. The operations in which he was engaged were scientific, and were not only interesting, but exceedingly valuable to him and profitable; and certainly one must regret that by an incident of this kind so much loss should have been sustained. But I must fairly own that I am unable to follow the Lord Ordinary in his reasoning. It appears to me that the whole ground of action is false. I think that the defender incurred no liability in consequence of anything which he did. I think that he acted simply as he was entitled to act in the exercise of his ordinary rights, and that there was no ground of complaint whatever in any part of his proceedings. On the other hand, I think —although the proof, voluminous as it is, is very slender on this point—that if the pursuer had taken reasonable precautions this injury would have been avoided. If instead of insisting on the defender taking measures which only impeded the operations in which he was engaged the pursuer had simply applied himself to see how the injury might be avoided, I think that he would have succeeded, and that with no great exertion, and at a moderate expense.

That is the general nature of the action and of the views I have come to form upon it. It is necessary, however, to consider the questions which have been raised a little more in detail.

Lord Herries is the proprietor of the whole subjects, which consist of the large pine wood which the defender was engaged in clearing, and also of the subjects which had been let for the purpose of these piscicultural operations. The defender was under contract to Lord Herries, and he was under contract to clear the forest within a particular time. It was a time bargain which he had made with Lord Herries, and therefore it was a matter of very considerable consequence to him not to be impeded in carrying out the clearance. The operation began in the winter time, when, of course, the hours of daylight were short, and when it was therefore of importance to proceed as rapidly as circumstances would permit. The ground has been indicated by a plan, and it appears that this fish hatchery was fed by a few small rivulets, some of them, the witnesses say, having no water in them at all during summer, some of them more or less. The mode in which the defender cleared the forest of the wood was by horse-power and dragging the trees along the ground, using certain drag roads which had been made on previous occasions by the forester—a very simple, and, as far as the evidence remove the dead fry from time to time as they were observed, and if this was done regularly, it would not follow that there was more organic contamination of the ponds in this than in other seasons. Therefore, while accepting the evidence that the fish were attacked by disease consequent on impurity in the water, I am disposed to hold that the damage is not proved to be the result of the defender's pollution, but is rather attributable to defective arrangement for which the pursuer is himself responsible." The Lord Ordinary then proceeded to estimate the amount of the damage, arriving at the conclusion stated in his interlocutor.

goes, a perfectly legitimate mode. The question is, was the "lower proprietor," as I may call him, engaged in these fish culture operations, entitled to object to the defender clearing the ground according to the ordinary way?

The Lord Ordinary has put three questions, which, he said, ought to be answered. (1) Was the defender made aware of the injury which the temporary fouling of the water would cause to the hatcheries? (2) Was it possible by the use of reasonable and inexpensive expedients to avoid the fouling of the water? (3) Was the defender negligent in the performance of the duty of taking reasonable care to avoid fouling the water? I think there are two questions omitted there. The first is, did the defender use more than his own legal rights in carrying out the operation which he performed, and did he perform it in the ordinary and well-defined way? and, secondly, did the pursuer observe the precautions which he might have observed for avoiding the fouling of the water? I am of opinion that both of these questions must be answered in favour of the defender. It was nothing more than an ordinary agricultural operation in which the defender was engaged, and if a man chooses to set up a scientific laboratory at the foot of a stream he must take his chance of the effect of ordinary agricultural operations which may go on higher up. I put the case of drainage. This is a moss, according to the evidence, with a forest on it. Now, if the proprietor of this plantation had chosen to clear the forest and to drain the moss, that would have fouled the streams which fed the hatchery beyond all doubt. But could it be said that any lower proprietor was entitled to object to those operations on the part of the upper proprietor? It is impossible to put in the balance against those operations any such damage as is founded on here. I am afraid the defender exercised no more than his right in carrying out his contract in the ordinary and usual method.

But there is another matter. The pursuer complains that the defender did not put bridges across the stream and haul the timber along these bridges. But would that have been an execution of his contract? I see that the defender's son is asked why he did not put bridges over the tributaries farther up at drag road No. 5, and he answers to that not unreasonably. He says,—"If we had done that we should have had to do it at a hundred and fifty places, because there were trees lying across these burns allwheres." Was the contractor bound to delay his execution of the contract to do all that? He had the greatest interest in this matter, for I see it is actually pleaded against him that he was too late in the fulfilment of his contract. The pursuer in this action actually puts himself into the right of Lord Herries, and pleads that he can claim damages because the defender was a trespasser, and had no right to be there at all. That is the very best possible reason why the defender should not have wasted time in making log bridges across the stream. The defender did not desire to carry that further than was reasonably necessary. If it could have been done reasonably and simply, then the defender had no desire to put the pursuer to expense; but when it is pleaded as a matter of right against the defender that is a different question. I think, further, that there are clear indications that the pursuer might if he had chosen—it might have cost him something, but there is no reason why it should not have cost him something—have well avoided the consequences of the fouling of the water.

On the whole matter I think that the action is unfounded, and that the contractor was only exercising his right in clearing the ground in the way he did. I am for assoilzieing the defender.

Lord Young.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the only questions which we can decide are, whether the defender did or did not commit a legal wrong against the pursuer, and, if he did, what was the damage consequent on that legal wrong? I agree with your Lordship in thinking he committed no such legal wrong, and consequently that no question of damages arises.

I do not dissent from the general proposition, as a general proposition, that anyone executing lawful operations—of course I am only dealing with such—upon his own property is bound to have a reasonable regard to the interests of his neighbour. He is not entitled to perform the operations in a particular way when he has ascertained that that will be hurtful to his neighbour, if there be another way equally available for his purposes which would not be injurious to his neighbour. He is not entitled to do his neighbour harm and then defend himself from liability by saying that his purpose was effected by carrying on his business in a particular way, when that particular way was not necessary for carrying on his business. As to what is required by considerations of right feeling and good neighbourhood we cannot enter on that except in a very rough way, and it is sufficient for me to say here—though it is somewhat out of the case—that I do not, upon the evidence, think there is any ground for imputing to the defender any want of right feeling or due consideration of his neighbours' interests. But, I repeat, the question for us is whether he committed a legal wrong? If the averment is true that what he did was done wilfully, maliciously—quite unnecessarily, as far as his own interest was concerned, and maliciously in order to inflict damage on the pursuer—then I am prepared to say that what he did would be actionable. But that view of the case, though presented on record, is utterly untenable on the evidence, and was not maintained to us in argument.

Then what is the case? The pursuer has quite lawfully established a sort of fish nursery—a hatchery—on the banks of a stream or burn called the Tannox Burn, and that burn—the Tannox Burn—receives into it several little tributaries. These tributaries are in reality mere ditches running through the woods of Kinharvie with some water in them—rain water chiefly—in winter, running dry when the weather is fair, and quite dry generally in summer. The largest of them is that which is marked on the plan "Hatchery Supply." That is the name which the pursuer has given to it, because he has run a pipe into it—quite lawfully, though it is outside the subject of the lease to him. That is the largest of the tributaries, and it is described by a surveyor very much in the language I have used—a ditch running through the wood. The others are smaller ditches running through the wood of Kinharvie.

Now, we know from the evidence that the wood through which these ditches pass suffered very severely from the storm of 1883-84, I think; that the trees were blown down all through it to an enormous extent, so that the right to take them away was purchased for many hundred pounds—I think a good deal over £1000. Well, they fell into these ditches, as they fell everywhere else, and the purchaser contracted to remove them. It was his right to remove them, but there were special stipulations between him and the landlord as to the removal. In removing them he dragged them over these ditches, because the ditches presented no impediment to dragging them over. If they had, he would have had to overcome the obstacle as he best might, but there being no impediment, what legal wrong did he commit in taking his horses and dragging over the ditches in the wood the blown-down timber which he had purchased and had contracted to carry away? The pursuer says,—"Oh, but a duty to me arose, for I had some very delicate ova in cradles in the hatchery, and if the mud is stirred up in the ditches it would get in among them in my premises through my pipe, and would do the ova an injury." I am of opinion that the defender was under no legal duty whatever in regard to this. It is nothing to the purpose to say that the defender could have prevented the injury at little expense. I rather think he could have done it at no great expense, and when it was brought prominently under his notice he did do something, I think, merely from good feeling and good neighbourliness, and not because he thought he was under any obligation. I refer to this only to illustrate what I meant when I said I thought there was no ground for imputing a want of right neighbourly consideration to the defender. But why did not this gentleman who was hatching these young fish attend to his own filtering operations? It would be extravagant on the statement of it to suggest that he could not have made his filters so as to prevent the mud stirred up by the operations of the defender from passing in among those fishes. I must assume that he could have done it at very trifling expense. But if he could not—if the expense of doing it made it not worth his while to do it—then that is just one of the results of putting his hatchery where he did, and the purchaser of the timber blown down in the forest had no concern with it at all. I think that what one right-minded man might be expected to do towards another the defender was willing to do, and did do, at some inconvenience to himself, and even cost. But to say that the duty was put upon him in this matter, of so clearing the forest of the blown-down timber as to cause the pursuer's hatchery no injury is, I think, a proposition for which there is no ground in reason, and certainly no authority.

I only wish to add that as at present advised I should not have allowed evidence here on the record as it stands. On the question of wilfully and maliciously, I should have required some statement of facts indicating the nature of the wilfulness and the malice, and the grounds for inferring their existence. When I put the question to the pursuer's counsel, and asked him what he founded on as indicating wilfulness and malice on the part of the defender, his answer was merely the fact that the defender did not put bridges at the places where they took timber across, or give the pursuer notice so that he might do so. I do not think I should have received that as any statement of wilful and malicious proceeding, and apart from that I should not have thought that there was on record any relevant statement to be remitted to probation. But taking the case as it is presented now—the concluded case—I think that the pleas for the pursuer ought to be repelled, the defences sustained, and the defender assoilzied.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, Petitioner.—Maconochie.
HONOURABLE BOUVERIE F. PRIMROSE AND ANOTHER, Compearers.—Murray.

Entail—Railway—Consigned money—Loan by trustees to heir in possession on security of fee-simple estate.—An heir of entail in possession prayed the Court to authorise trustees, who held a sum of money, consigned by a railway company as the price of part of the entailed lands taken for the purposes of their undertaking, in trust for himself and the succeeding heirs of entail, to lend the money to him on the security of an estate belonging to him in fee-simple. The Lord Ordinary (Trayner) reported the case to the First Division. The Court remitted the petition to the Lord Ordinary to sanction the proposed loan, on his being satisfied with the sufficiency of the proposed security.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
B.

IN 1885 the Forth Bridge Railway Company, in virtue of powers conferred by the Acts under which they were incorporated, took certain portions of the entailed lands of Dalmeny and others, Linlithgowshire, then held by the Earl of Rosebery as heir of entail in possession.

The price of the lands taken by the company was, under the authority of the Court, invested in the purchase of £5110, 18s. 9d. consols, which were taken in the names of the Honourable Bouverie F. Primrose, C.B., and James Auldjo Jamieson, W.S., who executed a deed of trust in 1886, whereby it was declared that they held the said consols in trust for the petitioner and the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the said entailed lands and estates, and whereby they bound and obliged themselves, at any time when required and under the direction of the Court of Session, to divest themselves of the said consols in favour of such party or parties or in such manner as the said Court should direct.

In April 1888 Lord Rosebery presented a petition to the Court in which, founding on secs. 67 and 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, he prayed the Court to authorise the trustees "to exchange the said consols, held by them in trust as aforesaid, for an equal amount of new stock created under the National Debt Conversion Act, 1888, and thereafter to sell the said new stock," or otherwise, to sell the foresaid sum of £5110, 18s. 9d. of consols, and, in either case, to "lend the proceeds to the petitioner on the security of his fee-simple estate of Malleny, in the county of Edinburgh." The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr H. B. Dewar, S.S.C., to report.

Mr Dewar in his report reported in favour of the first part of the prayer being granted, but with reference to the second part, viz., that the trustees should be authorised to lend the sum produced by the sale of the consols (which was deposited in bank), he drew the attention of the Lord Ordinary to the case of Innes, March 8, 1848, 10 D. 870, as a decision against the granting of the authority craved.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 19th May 1888, reported the case to the First Division.*

* "NOTE.—The petitioner prays the Court (1) to authorise the sale of certain stock held by trustees for behoof of the heirs of entail of the estates of Newhalls and others, of which he is at present the heir of entail in possession; and (2) to authorise the said trustees to lend the proceeds of such sale to the petitioner 'on the security of his fee-simple estate of Malleny.' The first part of the prayer I have granted, but with regard to the second part, it is pointed out by the reporter that in the case of Innes (10 D. 870), a case in all essential particulars the same as the present, it was announced by the Lords of the Second Division (after consultation with the other Judges) that it had been 'deter-

Argued for the petitioner;—(1) The present case was distinguished from the case of Innes[1] by the fact that here the fund was held by trustees for the heirs of entail, while the petitioner in the case of Innes was both granter and grantee of the bond. (2) There was no indication in the report of Innes upon what principle the Court based their decision, but probably it was that it was thought inadvisable that an heir of entail in possession should as such deal with himself in his individual capacity. But the Legislature and the Court had recognised such dealings, e.g., an heir of entail in possession could excamb part of the entailed estate with his own fee-simple estate.[2] Again, an heir of entail in possession could advance money for improvement expenditure, and grant a bond and disposition in security in his own favour over the estate, or could buy his own fee-simple estate with consigned money, and add the lands so bought to the entailed estate.[3] Further, an heir of entail when disentailing might charge the valued interest of the next heir upon the estate which was to become his in fee-simple.[4] That was a statutory recognition of a transaction precisely similar to that here proposed. The sole question came to be as to the sufficiency of the security, and that must be made the subject of inquiry.

During the hearing the trustees lodged a minute stating that they were willing that this part of the prayer should be granted if the security proved sufficient.

Lord President.—The money in the hand of the trustees arose from the circumstance that a portion of the entailed estate was taken by a railway company for the formation of a railway, and the compensation money paid by the railway company was lodged in the hands of the trustees, and invested by them in consols for the benefit of the heirs of entail. The object of the petition is to get authority to sell the consols and invest the money in heritable security, and it is proposed that the money should be lent to the heir of entail in possession on security of Malleny, an estate belonging to him in fee-simple. I should not have had any doubt of the propriety of this proposal, if the trustees are perfectly satisfied, which they seem to be, with the security offered, if an objection had not been raised by the reporter, and stated for our judgment by the Lord Ordinary. The objection is, that the proposal is opposed to the opinion of the Court in the case of Innes. That case occurred before the passing of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, and it is plausibly suggested by the reporter that under the existing Entail Acts the objection would not be received with the same favour. Probably it is enough to say that the present case is quite distinguishable from the case of Innes. In that case the bond was granted by the heir of entail in possession, as proprietor of an estate in fee-simple, in favour of himself and the mined never again to sanction the money being lent to the heir of entail himself.'

"That being so, I regard myself as precluded from considering whether the authority prayed for is unreasonable in itself, or from doing anything except giving effect to the determination of the Court so announced. The Court, however, may reconsider and, if it think fit, alter the decision announced in Innes' case, and I have reported this matter that the petitioner may have the opportunity which he desires of being heard thereon before the Court."

heirs under a deed of entail. That was an anomalous proceeding and one which might well startle the Court. The granter and grantee in the deed were the same. Now, there is nothing of that sort here. There is an independent trust, and the trustees hold a sum of money for the benefit of the heirs of entail, and it is proposed that these trustees should advance the money to the heir of entail in possession. If the security is good, I can see no objection to their doing so. The independent body of trustees is a separate person from the borrower, and the relation of debtor and creditor may competently subsist between them. The case is accordingly quite distinct from the case of Innes, and I propose to remit to the Lord Ordinary to sanction the loan, if he is satisfied with the sufficiency of the security.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship that this case is different from the case of Innes. I concur also that the application may be granted, subject to the approval by the Lord Ordinary of the sufficiency of the security. The application is by trustees who hold a sum of money, and the proposal is that the money should be invested on the security of the unentailed estate of Malleny. The relation of the parties is quite different here from the relation of the parties in the case of Innes. I see no difficulty in granting the trustees power to lend the money.

LORD ADAM.—I can see no objection to the proposal which is made. I understand that the trustees propose to lend money over the estate of Malleny, which is held in fee-simple. I also understand that they will not lend unless satisfied with the sufficiency of the security. I do not see any objection to giving them power to do so. It has been suggested that the proposal is against the case of Innes, and Lord Trayner, though he has no difficulty himself, has stated the case for our judgment. There are no opinions in the case of Innes. All that is there said is, that it had been determined "never again to sanction the money being lent to the heir of entail himself." Probably the facts would warrant the two additional words "by himself." That was the fact there. I give no judgment as to the case which would arise if the same state of facts came up again, but I am clear that the present application does not fall within the case of Innes.

THE COURT remitted to the Lord Ordinary to sanction the proposed loan on being satisfied of the sufficiency of the proposed security.

GEORGE PATERSON, blacksmith, Linlithgow, applied for admission to the poor's-roll in order that he might bring an action of damages for personal injury against the Linlithgow Police Commissioners.

On 22d June 1888, when the application was moved in the Single Bills, the Police Commissioners objected that the applicant's circumstances were not such as to entitle him to the benefit of the poor's-roll. The Court remitted to the reporters to inquire and report whether the applicant had a probable cause of action, and also whether his circumstances entitled him to the benefit of the poor's-roll.

The reporters reported that the applicant had a probable cause of action, that his wages were 27s. a-week, and that he had a wife and four children dependent on him, the eldest child being nine years of age, and the youngest six weeks.

The Police Commissioners again opposed the application, and argued that the practice of the Court was to refuse admission to one in such circumstances[1] as the applicant's. A man earning 23s. a-week had been refused admission.[2]

The applicant was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we should admit this applicant.

LORD YOUNG.—I also am for admitting him. I must own that I have heard with surprise certain observations in the cases which have been cited to us, for they appear to me to proceed on an erroneous consideration of the matter. The professional bodies are good enough—I rather think a law, a benignant law, requires them, but it is a law which they always gladly obey—to appoint members of their respective professions to act as agent and counsel for poor people who cannot afford the ordinary costs of litigation; but they give this gratuitous aid on the condition that no person shall have the benefit of it unless it is ascertained that he has a probable cause of litigation, and is in poor circumstances. That is for their protection, and I have always thought for nothing else, because where anyone sues another for an alleged wrong it is infinitely better for the defender, there being a probable cause of action ascertained, that his adversary should be in the hands of the agent and counsel for the poor than in the hands of others who take up his case only upon speculation. Therefore the report upon probabilis causa and poverty is really to protect the professional bodies against that gratuitous assistance being given to persons who are well able to afford the cost of litigation or who have no probabilis causa. Now, there is a probable cause of litigation here, and the poverty is that the applicant has a wife and family, and earns 27s. a-week. Looked at in the light of good sense, is a man in such circumstances able to pay a law-agent and counsel? I must say I think he is not, and I cannot concur with any observations, from whatever source they may come, to the effect that a man with a wife and family, who only earns 27s. a-week, is able to pay for counsel and agents.

I am, therefore, without any hesitation, of opinion that this man is entitled to admission.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I should prefer to follow what I think has been the practice of the Court, and refuse the motion. I do not think that we ought to establish a practice inconsistent with that of the other Division. There may be cases of exceptional circumstances which may prompt the relaxation of the ordinary rule, but this is not such a case. I am therefore for refusing the application.

Property—Theatre—Letters-patent—Patrimonial right.—In 1878 the lessee of a theatre in Glasgow, holding letters-patent granted by the Crown (under the Act 43 Geo. III. c. 142) authorising him, "his executors, administrators, and assigns," to maintain a company of players in a certain theatre in Glasgow, or any other theatre in a suitable place in Glasgow, for a certain term of years, assigned the letters-patent to the proprietor of the theatre. Subsequently the proprietor granted a bond and disposition in security for £13,000, which conveyed the subjects with the "parts, pertinents, and privileges thereof." The bondholders having entered into possession, let the theatre to a new tenant. Their lessee having continued to produce stage plays, and having no licence to do so except in so far as he had right to the letters-patent, the proprietor brought an action against him and the bondholders to have them interdicted from producing stage plays in the theatre in virtue of the licence in the letters-patent, the right to which he maintained was still in him.

The Court held that the pursuer had no title to sue, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young on the ground that the licence in the letters-patent was not a right of property separable from the theatre, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark on the ground that the pursuer had, by granting the bond and disposition in security, divested himself of his right to the letters-patent.

In 1869 the theatre in Dunlop Street was acquired by the Glasgow City Union Railway Company, and Glover leased another theatre in Hope Street, which thereafter was known as the Theatre Royal, in virtue of the foregoing letters-patent.

In 1878 this theatre was bought by Andrew Yuille and John Rae, and public Act, and shall be taken notice of as such by all Judges, Justices, and others in all Courts and places, without specially pleading the same."

The Act 6 and 7 Vict. cap. 68 (an Act for regulating Theatres), sec. 2, enacts,—"It shall not be lawful for any person to have or keep any house or other place of public resort in Great Britain for the public performance of stage plays without authority by virtue of letters-patent from Her Majesty, her heirs and successors or predecessors, or without licence from the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's household for the time being, or from the Justices of the Peace." The section then goes on to enact penalties.

* The letters-patent, after declarations prohibiting representations injurious to the christian religion or to good government, further bore,—"And our mind and will being that in future our theatre may conduce to the promotion of virtue and the improvement of human life, We, by these presents, command and order that no new play, or any old or revived play, shall be acted under the authority granted in these presents containing any sentiments or words hurtful to piety or good morals, until the same shall be corrected and purified by the said William Glover, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from all hurtful and offensive sentiments and expressions. Provided always that the said theatre or play-house, and the management thereof, shall be under and subject to the control and inspection of the Lord Provost, Bailies, Dean of Guild, and Deacon Convener of the Trades of the city of Glasgow, and of the Sheriff-depute of the county of Lanark for the time being."

Glover on 10th May 1878 assigned the letters-patent to Yuille and Rae, and "their heirs and assignees," in consideration of the sum of £400.

On 23d May 1878, Yuille and Rae, in security of an advance of £13,000 from a Mrs Anderson, granted a bond and disposition over the theatre in her favour. This bond contained no express reference to the letters-patent, but it conveyed,—"All and Whole" (here followed a description of the land by boundaries and measurements, including the following words, viz., "and partly by other property belonging to us, along which it extends 82 feet 1 inch or thereby, on the centre of the gable-wall and range thereof of the Theatre Royal"), "with the whole houses and buildings erected or to be erected on the subjects above disponed, parts, pertinents, and privileges thereof, and free ish and entry thereto, . . . and we assign the writs, and we grant warrandice."

The theatre was burned down in 1879, but was rebuilt in 1879-80. In July 1881, Mrs Anderson's trustees entered into possession of it under the bond and disposition in security. Thereafter the right under the bond passed to Mr and Mrs Richmond's marriage-contract trustees, by whom, in August 1887, the theatre was leased to William Thomas Rushbury.

In November 1887 Yuille (Rae being then dead) presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Rushbury to have him interdicted "from producing stage plays in the buildings known as the Theatre Royal, Hope Street, Glasgow, in virtue of the licence and authority contained in the royal letters-patent for the performance of stage plays in a theatre in Glasgow granted to William Glover, artist and theatrical manager in Glasgow, in the year 1868, to remain in force for the period of twenty-one years from the date thereof, and from using the said royal letters-patent in any manner of way without permission from the pursuer, or from interfering with the pursuer in any way in his use and enjoyment thereof."

The pursuer averred that the defender was performing stage plays in the theatre, and pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer is, in virtue of his titles, entitled to claim the protection of the Court against the acts of the defender complained of.

The defender did not dispute that he was performing stage plays in the theatre, but pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) All parties are not called. (3) The pursuer having been divested of any right he may have had in the letters-patent cannot enforce his present claim. (4) On a sound construction of the deeds and documents, and of the actings of parties as set forth on record, the bondholders are now in right of any interest which the pursuer may have possessed in the said letters-patent.

The bondholders—Richmond's trustees—were subsequently sisted as defenders, and adopted the defences for Rushbury.

The Sheriff-substitute (Lees), on 26th November 1887, sustained the first plea for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

The Sheriff (Berry) on appeal adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The bond and disposition in security did not carry the right to the letters-patent. These the pursuer retained as his property, and they could be used by him as applicable to any theatre in Glasgow. Or he might assign his right, for the right was in terms assignable. The defenders called their theatre the Theatre Royal, which implied that they were in right of the patent. He was entitled to interdict against that assumption of right.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuer had no title to sue. The bond carried the patent as a pertinent of the theatre, and without that word the patent would have been carried as an essential of the theatre. The right under the grant of letters-patent was not separable from the theatre. Even if it were, the defenders were in no way infringing the pursuer's rights, for at the most his argument came to this, that they were using the theatre without a licence, and that was no concern of his.*

Yuille v. Rushbury.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It may turn out to be true, and we have heard a very able argument to that effect, that the present proprietors or occupants of this theatre are not entitled to the benefit of these letters-patent, but I do not think that in the position in which the parties now stand the remedy of interdict is open to the pursuer. It appears to me that the whole question resolves itself into this. Is it the case that the pursuer has by assignation a right to these letters-patent for the purposes for which they were granted? I rather think he has, but I apprehend for no other purposes whatever. If the nature of the letters-patent is to confer the benefit of them on the person who is in the act of carrying on the business of the theatre, I do not see that the grantee of the letters-patent may not assign them for that purpose if he pleases, but unless he carries on the business of the theatre himself, or assigns the letters-patent to another for the purpose of producing stage plays at the theatre, I think he cannot have any right effectual in his own person. That appears to me to be the necessary result, and consequently I think that it is not within the right of the pursuer to ask us to interdict the defenders from taking upon themselves to say that they are entitled to use the letters-patent, of which the pursuer himself makes no use except to withhold them from the defenders. It may quite well be that he is entitled to assign these letters-patent to the defender if he chooses, and for any consideration which he pleases. That is a totally different matter. But apart from the right to use these letters-patent himself or to assign them to someone else for the purpose of producing stage plays at the theatre, the pursuer has, I think, no right at all in the letters-patent. I am of opinion therefore that he is not entitled to succeed in this application.

Lord Young.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I must take the liberty of saying that in my opinion the case is an exceptionally clear one in several views of it.

I think the legal character of the letters-patent here has not been sufficiently attended to. Letters-patent in their legal character are only the licences for a particular theatre as a place of public amusement, nothing more. Such places of public amusement may be otherwise licensed. They may be licensed by the Lord Chamberlain or by the Justices of the Peace, but by whomsoever granted the licence itself is not property. It is a matter of mere police regulation for the preservation of good order and decency, and I do not think that letters-patent such as these here, any more than licences by Justices of the Peace or licences of the Lord Chamberlain, can be regarded as in any sense patrimonial estate.

The patent with which we are here dealing proceeds on the Act 43 Geo. III. c. 142, which proceeds on the narrative that a licensed play-house in the city of Glasgow would be of convenience to the said city, and to persons resorting thereto, and it authorises the Sovereign "to grant letters-patent for establishing a theatre or play-house in the city of Glasgow, suburbs, or neighbourhood thereof, subject to such restrictions as to the number of persons to be interested therein, and in the profits thereof, and with such privileges and under such provisions and regulations for the due and orderly conducting and managing the same as to His Majesty shall seem fit." That is the authority given to the Crown to promote the convenience of the city of Glasgow by licensing in the form of letters-patent a play-house in that city. The letters-patent, proceeding on that narrative, go on to grant a licence to the then proprietor of the theatre in Dunlop Street, Mr Glover, and his "executors, administrators, or assigns," and make the licence applicable not only to that theatre but to any other theatre which might be put up in substitution therefor. The grant in favour of Glover, his heirs, executors, and assigns, is mere words of style, for we were told that the letters-patent in the case of the Edinburgh Theatre Royal are in favour of the Duke of Buccleuch, Mr Cowan, M.P., and the Lord Provost for the time being. On them is put the duty of regulating everything connected with the proper conduct of the theatre, it being reserved to the Crown to revoke the letters-patent at any time, and that gives some security that the letters-patent would be used for the purpose for which alone they were granted.

* It was stated at the bar that in the case of the Edinburgh Theatre Royal, which was also licensed by royal letters-patent in virtue of an Act of Parliament similar to that of the Glasgow Theatre, the letters-patent were in favour of the Duke of Buccleuch, Mr Cowan, M.P. for the city, and the Lord Provost for the time being and their "heirs, successors, and assigns."

Now, what we have to consider in one view of the case is whether these letters-patent are separable from the theatre, so that they may be separate patrimonial estate, saleable in the market, and putting the owner for the time being into the position of being able to make a pecuniary exaction from any person conducting performances in the theatre. I asked during the argument whether such a thing had ever been heard of. I was told it was quite common. I must say I do not believe it. I doubt whether such a thing has ever occurred. It would be quite foreign to the purpose, nature, and legal character of such letters-patent or other licences that they should be patrimonial estate, saleable or marketable property, such as would pass to a trustee in bankruptcy or could be attached by creditors. That is not their nature. However, Glover, when the theatre was sold, went through the form, which I should have thought unnecessary, of assigning the letters-patent to the purchasers Rae and Yuille. I think that he could not have assigned the letters-patent to anyone else, nor could he have retained them as a separate rent-yielding subject himself. I therefore think that the pursuer has no estate in the letters-patent at all in virtue of which he can present this application, and that any right, privilege, or profits under them are with the respondents in virtue of the title they have to the theatre to which the letters-patent apply.

But there is another view upon which I am equally clear, and it is sufficient for the decision of the case in my opinion. I have already pointed out that according to my views these letters-patent do not differ in their legal character from licences of the Lord Chamberlain or Justices of the Peace. They are of the same character, for the well-being of the citizens, and of people going to the theatre, to secure orderly performances. What is the consequence to anyone performing stage plays without letters-patent or a licence from the Lord Chamberlain or from Justices of the Peace? It is not a matter of the law of property, but of police regulation and order, for I find in the Act of Parliament that such persons are liable to prosecution. The Act of 1843 (6 and 7 Vict. cap. 68), in its second clause enacts that any person carrying on a theatre without certificate by letters-patent shall be liable in a penalty. Now, what other virtue can there be in a licence or in letters-patent except to exempt from penalties. It is said that the respondents proclaim that they are holders of a licence by royal letters-patent. What interest has the pursuer in that? None that I can see. It is a mere announcement that they consider that they have the right to perform plays which letters-patent give them. It can be the interest only of those who have to prosecute for the public to inquire into that. The licence can be of no use whatever except as an answer to a prosecution for penalties. I cannot see how it concerns Mr Yuille in any way. I am, then, clearly of opinion that Mr Yuille has no patrimonial estate in the letters-patent at all, and no title to sue.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I have come to be of the same opinion. At first I had some hesitation arising from the circumstance that the pursuer had an express assignation to the letters-patent, and that the defenders had no express right to the letters-patent at all. If it were true that the defenders had no right, it might have been maintained on plausible grounds that, whatever the character of letters-patent, the pursuer as assignee might prevent the defenders using them, or even claiming to have right to them. But further consideration has satisfied me that the pursuer divested himself of them in favour of the defenders,—the bondholders,—so far as necessary at all events to enable them to use thereafter the subjects of the security. He disponed to them the theatre with "parts, pertinents, and privileges," and I do not think a debtor so disponing to creditors could prevent them making the best use of the theatre in order to realise their debt. The contention of the pursuer really comes to this, that although he has given a security to them as his creditors it nevertheless shall not avail them to the best effect. I think the effect of the security was to enable them to use it as best they could, and that one of the ways, and indeed the only available way, was to use it as a theatre for which the licence was held by the owner. That right is, I think, fairly covered by the word "privilege," but even if that word had not been in the bond I should have come to the same conclusion.

Fishings—Salmon-Fishings—Competing Title—Possession.—In an action brought by the burgh of Inverness and others, for declarator that the pursuers had the exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the river Ness from both banks from the stone X to the sea, the pursuers founded on a crown charter dated in 1591 ratifying all former grants to the town, and conveying "aquam de Nyss omnesque partes ac utrumque latus . . . . cum omnibus piscationibus et piscariis tam salmonum quam aliorum piscium." Defences were lodged by the proprietor of the estate of Holme on the south bank, part of which was situate above the stone X and part below that mark. The defender held one half of the lands of Holme under Fraser of Balnain as superior upon a title which did not carry any right of fishing, and the other half of the lands as a feu from the Earl of Moray, on a title in which the subjects were described as "toto et integro dimidio villæ et terrarum de Holme . . . cum dimidio salmonum piscarium super aqua de Ness ad dict. terras apertans," the superior's title being a charter granted by Queen Mary in 1566 in favour of the Earl of Moray, conveying "dimidietatem terrarum de Holme cum salmonu et aliis piscariis earundem in aqua de Nyss." The disputed portion of the fishings (below the stone X) was ex adverso of part of the lands held of the Earl of Moray; the upper portion of the Holme fishings, which was not in dispute, was partly ex adverso of the remainder of Lord Moray's feu and partly of Fraser of Balnain's feu. The defender did not dispute the pursuers' right to fish for salmon ex adverso of Holme below the stone X, but claimed a right along with them. The defender admitted that he had possessed the salmon-fishing ex adverso of the upper half of Holme. As regarded the possession ex adverso of the lower half it was proved that for almost the whole period from 1820 to 1840 the Holme fishings and the town fishings were let to the same tenant; that in 1843 the defender had in a petition for interdict unsuccessfully attempted to prevent the tenant of the town's fishings from fishing on the Holme side of the river; that since 1843 the defender had granted successive leases of the salmon-fishings of Holme, sometimes describing them as extending from the western boundary of Holme to the eastern, and that the tenants had fished for salmon with net and coble to 1853, and from that date with the rod, without challenge down to the eastern or lower boundary of Holme.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) held that the pursuers' title ought to receive effect according to its terms, the defender's title not being contradictory thereto when construed, as it might be, as a grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the upper half of Holme.

On a reclaiming note, held that the defender was entitled to absolvitor, in respect (1) that the grant to the Earl of Moray of one-half of the salmon-fishings of Holme was to be construed as a grant of one-half pro indiviso of the fishings pertaining to the whole lands of Holme; (2) that in the absence of evidence to the contrary, these were to be regarded as the fishings ex adverso of the whole lands; and (3) that the defender's possession was sufficient to preserve his right; diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark, who held that the defender's possession of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the upper half of Holme had identified these as the half of the fishings granted to the Earl of Moray, and that he had proved no possession of salmon-fishings ex adverso of the lower half sufficient to deprive the pursuers of the exclusive right conferred on them by the charter of 1591.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that a general grant of fishings may be explained to include salmon-fishings by possession thereof in other ways than by net and coble fishing. Opinion contra per Lord Rutherfurd Clark.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

THIS was an action by the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs Warrand of Bught and the Provost and Magistrates of Inverness against Angus Mackintosh of Holme, in the county of Inverness, and Charles Innes, solicitor, Inverness, for any interest he might have, for declarator that the pursuers and the defender Innes had "the sole and exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the river Ness from both banks, from the Stone of Clachnahagaig to the mouth of the river where it joins the sea at low water, with the exception of the fishing known as the Duke of Gordon's Fishing, below the Castle Hill, and the fishing further down the river known as the Friars' Fishing or Friars' Shot." The pursuers further sought declarator that the defender Mackintosh had "no right or title to fish for salmon upon the said river within the bounds foresaid, and, in particular, has no right or title to fish for salmon in that portion of the river which is immediately below the site of a cottage upon the east bank of the same, opposite or nearly opposite the point upon the west bank where the lands of Bught marched with the lands of Dunain prior to the construction of the Caledonian Canal."

The titles on which the pursuers founded commenced with a charter from the Crown dated 1st January 1591, granted by King James VI. This charter ratified all former grants in favour of the town of Inverness, and conveyed, inter alia, to the town of Inverness,—"Totam et integram aquam de Ness, omnesque partes, ac utrumque latus ejusdem, inter lapidem vocat Clachnahaggag et mare, cum omnibus piscationibus et piscariis tam salmonum quam aliorum piscium." Infeftment followed on this grant. The pursuers were in right of this grant along with the defender Charles Innes. The fishings belonging to the town of Inverness, as granted by the charter and described in it, subject to the exception hereafter stated, having been exercised at one time by four cobles, were known as the Four Cobles Fishings. The fishings were feued off by the town from time to time in cobles and fractional parts of a coble to various burgesses and heritors, the right of each feuar extending over the whole, and being exercised in common with that of the other feuars. The pursuers, Warrand's Trustees, had three and a-third cobles, the defender Innes one-sixth, and the Magistrates retained one-half.

The pursuers stated that they had, in virtue of their title, exercised along with Mr Innes, peaceably, from time immemorial, or at least for more than forty years, the sole and exclusive right of salmon-fishing from both banks between the Clachnahagaig stone and the sea. They admitted, however, that between that stone and the sea there were two places at which they had no right under these titles, and had not exercised any possession. These were the two fishings known as the Duke of Gordon's Fishings and the Friars' Shot. These fishings had been given out by the Crown by still more ancient grants. The former belonged to the Gordon family. The latter had been given out to a religious house by a charter of Alexander III., but by a charter of 1567 it was granted to the town of Inverness.

Defences were lodged for Angus Mackintosh of Holme, whose estate extended along the right bank of the river for about a mile above and a mile below the site of the Stone Clachnahagaig. The stone had been removed when the Caledonian Canal was formed, and the pursuer averred that it was opposite the point where the lands of Bught marched with the lands of Dunain.

The defender claimed right to salmon-fishings ex adverso of Holme, and averred that he and his authors had enjoyed continuous possession thereof.

The defender's title began with a crown charter, dated 1st June 1566, bearing that "Henry and Mary," "King and Queen of Scots," granted and confirmed to James Earl of Moray the whole lands of Moray, containing " . . . dimidietatem terrarum de holme cum salmonu et aliis piscariis earun. in aqua de Nyss." The defender produced no infeftment following on this charter. The charter, "togidder with the precept and instrument of seesing following thairupon," was ratified by Parliament on 5th June 1592, by a "ratification to the Erll of Moray of his infeftments."

That half of the estate of Holme came into the defender's family from the Earls of Moray, and was still held of the Earl of Moray as superior at the date of this action. On 4th September 1706 the Earl of Moray granted in favour of John Mackintosh of Holme a precept of clare constat, in which the lands were described,—"toto et integro dimidio villae et terrarum de Holme et in dimidio molendini de Holme astrictis multuris et sequelis ejusdem cum dimidio salmonum piscarium super aqua de Ness ad dict. terras apertans. . . ."

The other half of the defender's estate of Holme came into his family from the Laird of Cawdor in 1706. There was in the title to it no mention of fishings. At the date of the action now reported that half was held of Fraser of Balnain as superior.

The fishings in dispute (below the Stone Clachnahagaig) were ex adverso of part of the feu from Lord Moray. The fishings above the stone, which were possessed by Holme, were ex adverso of the remainder of Lord Moray's feu and of the feu held of Fraser of Balnain.

A marriage-contract of the laird of Holme in 1780 described Holme as comprehending " the mains and manor-place thereof, Belnahoan and Ness-side, holden of the Earl of Moray, the milltoun of Holme, goosecroft, mill, and mill lands, holden of the laird of Calder."

Miltoun of Holme and Ness-side were on the bank of the river above the Stone of Clachnahagaig.

A proof was led.

It appeared that in 1843 the defender, then in minority, had applied to the Sheriff for interdict against Archibald Tait, a perfumer and fishing-tackle maker in Inverness, lessee of the town fishings, to prevent him from fishing for salmon on the Holme side of the Ness, immediately opposite to Holme, and drawing his nets on the Holme bank. Tait denied the defender's right to salmon-fishings below the Clachnahagaig stone, and stated that he himself had right to the salmon-fishing, and had held exclusive possession thereof. Interim interdict having been granted, the Sheriff allowed the respondent a proof and to the petitioner a conjunct probation. Proof was led for the respondent in 1843, 1844, 1845, and 1846, but was not closed, and on 21st December 1848 the Sheriff renewed the order and prorogated the period for reporting the proof. No further procedure took place until 8th July 1852, when a summons of wakening was raised by the respondent Tait. No proof was led for Mr Mackintosh, and the interdict was recalled in February 1853. In the present action the defender thus explained the reason for no proof being adduced by him :—" In June 1852 I was kidnapped at Edinburgh, and forcibly conveyed to Saughton Hall, where I was kept for six weeks. I effected my escape. I came to reside at Ness Side early in the winter of 1852, and was there when the interdict was recalled. Mr Charles Stewart was my law-agent. I was so engrossed by what had occurred that I could think of nothing else, and in these circumstances the interdict came to be recalled, and the action fell asleep after that. I believe this was the history of it: I being then in the country, the other party, knowing the troubles I had been involved in, thought it would be a good opportunity to revive the action, which had been asleep since 1846, and get it settled; and, through my agent, I had notices served upon me that it was necessary for me at once to proceed with the proof, or, if that was not done, the interdict would be recalled. Being entirely engrossed with other matters, I felt I could not resume the question, and that I must acquiesce; but I knew that any action to finally settle my rights would require to be raised in the Supreme Court."

In the present action the Lord Ordinary admitted the respondents' proof in the interdict process. In it a witness named M'Naughton deponed that he had had a lease for a year from Angus Mackintosh of Holme, who died in 1817, of the Holme fishings, who had pointed out to him the march at a point close to the spot where the Stone of Clachnahagaig was said by the pursuers to have been, and had told witness that he could not give him permission to go farther down the river. It appeared, however, that from 1820 to 1830 a man named Stevenson had held the town fishings and Friars' Shot, and also the Holme fishings, as a tacksman. He failed in 1830, and for a time had not the town fishings, but afterwards got part of them again. He had retained during his difficulties the Holme fishings. He continued to hold both the town and the Holme fishings till 1839.

In the proof led before the Lord Ordinary both parties endeavoured to establish exclusive possession of fishings below the alleged site of the Clachnahagaig stone, ex adverso of the lands of Holme, but in the Inner-House the defender did not maintain that he had an exclusive right. The following facts appeared from the proof:—

In 1840 and 1841 Mr Mackenzie, banker, was tenant of the fishings at a rent of £30. They were let to John Grant of the Caledonian Hotel, Inverness, for the years 1843, 1844, and 1845 at a rent of £50, and were described in the lease as extending from Ness Cottage, the eastern boundary of Holme, to the march with Lady Saltoun on the west. Alexander Paterson deponed that he was a member of the fishing crew under Grant's foreman,—"We fished with the net over the whole of the water," "from the Saltoun march to Ness Cottage. We did not go to the lower water unless we could not get salmon at the top. The top water was the best. We were never stopped or challenged." Other witnesses gave evidence to the same effect in regard to the fishing by those in right of Holme for the period down to 1849. The defender deponed,—"Since 1850 my tenants have always been sporting tenants, though they have power to use net and coble if they choose. Previous to 1849 I think the tenants had the water principally for netting purposes." From November 1853 to November 1861 the Holme fishings were let to Nathaniel Weekes. Alexander Fraser deponed,—"Mr Weekes fished with the net. I was one of his crew. He liked us to fish for an hour or two at night. I have seen him net the river down to Ness Cottage."

For the season 1862 a lease of the Holme fishings from the western boundary of Holme "downwards to the point at which the mill-lead of Holme Mills re-enters the river" (this was about a third of a mile above Ness Cottage, the eastern march), was granted to a Mr Reeve of London. Another lease was granted to Mr Reeve for the next five years "with power to fish with cobles, nets," &c.—rent £135.

The fishings, described in the same terms, were let for the five years 1868 to 1872 to Mr Alfred Dennison, London, at £330. Mr Dennison had subsequent leases which expired in 1879.

Mr Charles Innes, who was the defender's factor from 1869 to 1884, deponed,—"I rented in 1876 and 1877 two cobles belonging to Muirton and Bunchrew, and Mr Mackintosh, finding that Mr Denison did not care much about the lower fishings, and hardly ever went there, allowed me to fish that lower water, consisting of the Redbraes, Pooley, and the Mill Stream down to the tail of the mill-lade. I acquired an infinitesimal portion of the Four Cobles, and another portion in 1880, making together one twenty-fourth of the Four Cobles. In 1880 I became a regular tenant of Holme, and took from him the lower water from Redbraes downwards. I have had these waters ever since." I have in every year given permission to various individuals to fish in the water rented by me from Holme, but when I did that I always gave a written order, and made it distinctly understood by these people that what they were to do was to exercise the right derived by me from Mackintosh of Holme. I never delegated the one twenty-fourth right which I had as proprietor to any of these occasional fishers. I have myself very little time for fishing. I am always out of that part of the country during the time when the salmon are running, and I have only fished in the Holme water in the spring occasionally. I paid £5 a-year of rent for several years, and since the granting of the lease in 1884 I have paid £10." There was evidence of rod-fishing by persons who got permission from Mr Innes.

The defender also led other evidence to shew that the water in question had been fished with the rod by those in his right, and that he had turned off people who did not have right from him.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 10th January 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, on the sound construction of the title-deeds, and in conformity with the evidence as to past possession, the pursuers are entitled, as deriving right from the Magistrates of Inverness, to the salmon-fishings concluded for, and therefore finds and declares, interdicts, prohibits, and discharges, in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and decerns." *

* "Opinion.—The conclusion of the action is, that it should be found and declared that the pursuers and Mr Innes, who is called for his interest, have the sole and exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the River Ness from both banks, from the Stone of Clachnahagaig to the mouth of the river where it joins the sea at low water, with the exception of two pools there described, and which are known to belong to other parties. The defender maintains that the fishing on the right bank of the Ness, from the Stone of Clachnahagaig to his march, is his private property. The question of title is therefore limited to the fishing of a small part of the right bank of the river. Each party founds on a crown title, and a considerable mass of documentary and parole evidence has been imported into the case. I have carefully considered the documentary evidence embraced in the joint print for the parties, including the proof taken before the Sheriff of Inverness-shire in a previous action. While the weight of the evidence is, in my opinion, altogether favourable to the case of the pursuers, whose title is derived from the Magistrates of Inverness, I judge that the element of chief importance is that of title, which I shall accordingly proceed to consider.

"For the better understanding of the evidence, it is necessary to keep in view that the right of fishing, as derived by the Magistrates from the Crown, whatever its extent may be, was at an early period divided into the fishing of 'four cobles.' This arrangement apparently suggests a practice of fishing by no more than four persons or parties at a time. But it is in evidence that the rights of the proprietors of the different cobles were split into smaller portions, and these fractional rights were understood to confer a privilege of rod fishing on the possessors. This circumstance does not really affect the merits of the present case. Apparently the whole of the shares into which the four cobles came to be divided have been acquired by the pursuers and Mr Innes, and their title is the title of the Magistrates of Inverness.

"The existing title of the Magistrates to the burgh property is a charter granted by King James VI. in 1591. . . . . The charter conveys to the Magistrates 'the water of Ness in its whole extent, and on either side thereof, betwixt the stone called Clachnahagaig and the sea, with all fishings and fishing stations of salmon, as well as other fish.'

"The title of the defender is founded on a charter of Queen Mary in favour of James Earl of Moray and spouse, dated 1st June 1566—twenty-five years earlier than the charter in favour of the Magistrates. This charter conveys to Lord Moray 'one-half of the lands of Holme, with the salmon and other fishings of the same in the water of Ness.' These are the only words that appear to me to be material to the question.

"Now, in the absence of any competing title, I do not doubt that the charter in favour of Lord Moray would be a sufficient title to the defender to support his claim to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the entire river boundary of his estate. The fishings conveyed with the half of the lands of Holme are 'the fishings of the same in the water of Ness'; and, in the absence of a competing right, I should conceive this to be a perfectly good title to all fishings on the water of Ness which are situated in or adjacent to the property conveyed. But I am also of opinion that the grant of the salmon-fishings is susceptible of a more limited interpretation. A grant of the fishings 'of the same,' that is of the lands, means, in my judgment, fishings which have been possessed along with the lands, whatever these may be; and it is only in the absence of a competing right that the grant of fishings would receive an interpretation co-extensive with the boundary of the lands.

"The grant to the Magistrates is expressed in a different way. It is not a general grant of fishings in the Ness pertaining to the burgh, but is a grant of fishings described by known landmarks. In particular, the Stone of Clachnahagaig, which is the upper terminus of the Magistrates' right, was in existence until a comparatively recent period. It is spoken to by a considerable number of witnesses, and there is nothing in the evidence which suggests a doubt as to the identification of this landmark. The identity of the stone described by that name in the titles of course depends upon oral tradition, just like the identity of any other landmark; and it is not suggested by anyone that the stone mentioned in King James's charter was outside the boundary of the Holme estate, or was indeed any other than the stone spoken to by the witnesses.

"Comparing the grant to the Magistrates with the grant to the proprietor of Holme, my opinion is that the right given to the Magistrates by precise and defined bounding description must prevail over the undefined grant in favour of Holme where the two titles come into competition. It is urged against this view that the Holme title is the earlier in date, and to this the pursuers reply that the charter of the Magistrates bears to be a confirmation of three previous charters, going back to the time of King William, and which, it is supposed, were in identical terms. When the question is one of boundary, and especially of a river boundary, which is liable to physical changes, I do not think that it can be assumed that the terms of the previous charters were identical with that under consideration. At the same time, it is a circumstance in favour of the Magistrates' charter, that it bears to be a renewal grant; and that unquestionably the greater part of the salmon-fishing confirmed to the Magistrates by the charter of King James had been in their possession from very early times. I do not understand that this is disputed. It is therefore much more probable that, in the matter of salmon-fishing, the charter of King James merely echoed the words of grant of previous charters than that it professed to take away, by the device of a new bounding description, part of the fishing right which had been previously given to Lord Moray. But I conceive that this result can be reached through the titles themselves without taking into account the probabilities of the case as regards previous possession. The grant to the Magistrates includes both banks of the river, from the Stone of Clachnahagaig downwards; but there is a reasonable extent of river boundary above the Stone of Clachnahagaig which the proprietors of Holme have enjoyed without dispute, and this fishing includes what all the witnesses agree in declaring to be the best fishing pool in the Ness. It appears to me, therefore, that there is no real contradiction between the two titles. The title of the Magistrates ought to receive effect according to its boundaries, and sufficient effect is given to the conveyance of the fishings of Holme to Lord Moray by holding that conveyance to apply to so much of the water as has admittedly been possessed by the proprietors of Holme without dispute.

"The observations which I have made express my judgment on the point, independently of the evidence, or as it would have been given if the parties had agreed that no light could be thrown upon the question by evidence of past possession. I cannot say that the evidence is very strong or conclusive in favour of the pursuers, had evidence been necessary to sustain their claim. I shall, however, indicate briefly my view regarding it. Both parties are founding upon historical documents, which have been traced out with much industry and research from local records. The most general result derivable from the early documents is, that from 1680 to 1769 the town of Inverness and the proprietors of Holme, whose title was derived from Lord Moray, were at variance regarding their boundaries, or it might be more correct to say, regarding a tract of debateable land which lay adjacent to the site of the fishing now in dispute. This land appears to have been claimed by the Magistrates under the name of the Burgh Moor. It was also claimed by the Mackintosh family by their estate title; and it appears from the burgh records that at various times portions of the moor had been enclosed by the proprietors of Holme, and converted into arable land. Eventually the burgh acquiesced in the claim made by the Mackintoshes; and there can be no doubt that for a period much exceeding that of prescription, by their title alone they would hardly prevail, for their title gave them the whole fishings from Clachnahagaig to the sea, but they admitted that the defenders' family have been unquestioned proprietors of the land ex adverso of the disputed fishing. It was argued for the pursuers, founding upon the ancient plan, and on the records here referred to, that the lands ex adverso of the fishings were originally the property of the burgh; and that while the Magistrates had lost their right to the lands by negligence or acquiescence, they had successfully maintained the possession of the adjacent fishings. This appeared to me at the time to be a somewhat hazardous argument for the pursuers. If the lands and the fishings do not necessarily or probably go together, then the argument comes to nothing. If I am to assume it as natural and probable that the lands and fishings were held together, I must take it as a fact that Mr Mackintosh is proprietor of the lands, and I cannot enter into the consideration of whether the possession was justly acquired, or whether it was in reality an encroachment. The presumption, of course, is in favour of a just title, and that presumption will operate entirely in favour of the defender. But for the reasons stated, I do not consider that it is necessary to assume that the lands and fishings were conterminous. The charter defines the fishings by proper descriptive words, and apparently is less explicit in regard to the boundaries of the burgh property. It seems to me that what is the subject of precise description does not stand in need of illustration from what is confessedly more or less doubtful and undefined.

"With respect to the parole evidence, it is not necessary that I should analyse it in detail, because its import is very evident. In an action of interdict instituted by the guardian of the present proprietor in 1843, the Sheriff allowed the respondent (the lessee under the Magistrates' title) a proof of his averments, and to the petitioner (Mr Mackintosh) a conjunct probation. Under this order proof was adduced by the respondent, which will be found in the Joint Print, pp. 68-109. Its import is, that for forty years prior to the action, the possession of the Magistrates, their disponees and tenants, had been co-extensive with the boundary in the charter of King James; and in particular that the Magistrates' right of fishing had been exercised through tenants during the whole or a great part of that period by fishing from the shore, and drawing nets to the shore, on that part of Mr Mackintosh's estate which lies below the Stone of Clachnahagaig. No proof was offered for Mr Mackintosh, and some years later the interim interdict, which had been originally granted by the Sheriff, was recalled. The defender offers an explanation intended to displace the inference, which might be drawn, that he had no contrary proof to offer. His explanation is quite intelligible, and is offered, I am sure, in perfect good faith. But the effect remains, that a strong case on the evidence was made by those deriving right through the Magistrates; that this proof was not seriously shaken by cross-examination, and that no evidence to the contrary was adduced. Another period of forty years has since elapsed, and of course it is no longer possible to obtain further parole evidence applicable to the possession in the earlier part of the present century. So far as we have proof applicable to the period 1800-43, it must be taken that the possession was in conformity with the charter. This result, in my opinion, is not displaced by the evidence adduced in the present case.

"With respect to the evidence as to the possession subsequent to 1843, it is admitted by counsel on both sides that the state of possession is ambiguous. Neither party acquiesced in the claim of the other; and while I think that there has been more regular and effective possession by the proprietors or tenants of the Four Cobles Fishing than by the defender, yet during this period the defender has sufficiently asserted his right to keep the question open for future consideration. The matter has now been raised for the first time in a form which will enable the question of right to be brought to a final decision; and, so far as that depends on my judgment, I give it in favour of the pursuers."

they had neither the Duke of Gordon's Fishings nor the Friars' Shot, both of which were within that boundary. It was therefore clear that they could not rely wholly on their title. The defender's title comprehended the fishings in question.[1] It was a title to half the lands of Holme with salmon-fishings "of the same," i.e., "of these lands." The pursuers' title, when it came into collision with such a title, would require exclusive possession in order to exclude the defender. But they had had no exclusive possession. At the best they had joint possession with the defender. It was said that the defender's exclusive possession of the upper water both explained and satisfied his title. But that was to omit the fact that his possession had not been of the upper water alone but of the whole. Title and possession were conclusive in Stuart's case.[2] The defender's title was of older date than the pursuers', and the latter ought therefore, if harmonising were needed, to be explained so as to consist with it. The Lord Ordinary seemed to adopt an opposite course.

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers' title bore to be a ratification of an older title, and, it must be presumed, was in the same terms as that older title. But further, it was in itself unambiguous and exclusive. The fishings which were admittedly the exclusive property of the defender fully satisfied and explained his title. It seemed doubtful if in early times, when the charter was granted, the lands of Holme extended below Clachnahagaig. It rather appeared they did not, but that the town had claimed the lands now part of Holme up so far as Clachnahagaig. The old case in 1775,[3] though the defender's author, no doubt, was not a party to it, shewed that it was not then suggested that the laird of Holme had any fishings below Clachnahagaig. The evidence in the process of interdict in 1843 seemed conclusive of the pursuers' exclusive possession for forty years before that date. Even if the possession since then had been divided and disputed, such disputed possession could not constitute a joint right in the defender, for each party was claiming to possess exclusively. The defender's alleged possession was by rod-fishing. But net and coble was the only possession whereby he could prescribe a right. Even his alleged possession by rod-fishing failed. Admittedly one of his tenants, Dennison, never fished the disputed water, and it was an insufficient explanation that the upper water was better. The possession of Mr Innes was very recent. It was also immaterial, for he was one of the proprietors of the Four Cobles Fishing along with the pursuers, and they were entitled to attribute his fishing to that right. On the whole case the defender must fail, because (1) though he had right to half the fishings, that had been explained by use to be a particular half; (2) because a title to a half could never start prescription of the whole.

raised as to the topographical position of the Stone of Clachnahagaig; and I was under the impression that, although the stone had disappeared, the parties were agreed as to its true situation. It has since been pointed out that there is some discrepancy in the evidence regarding the situation of this landmark. The summons is not very well adapted to raise such a question; and the case is now beyond my control, because I have given decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. It will be for the Inner-House, either by themselves or by a remit to the Lord Ordinary, to settle the position of this landmark, assuming that the parties are unable to come to an agreement regarding it."

Warrand's Trustees v. Mackintosh.

The question regards the fishings ex adverso of the lands of Holme in the river Ness below the site of the cottage mentioned in the summons, and which does not now remain. The first thing to consider of course is the title of the parties. They are in conflict about these fishings in the Ness ex adverso of the lands of Holme below that cottage, and about nothing else. As I say, the first question is, what are their respective titles? Now, I do not refer at all particularly to the title of the pursuers, because their title to fish in the river at the part of it in question is not disputed. Their title is not given to them, and they do not hold it, in connection with any lands. The leading pursuers, Mrs Warrand's trustees, hold the lands of Bught on the north side of the river, but the fishings are in no way attached to those lands, nor is the title to them connected with those lands. They derived their title from the town of Inverness, and the town of Inverness is represented here by the Provost and Magistrates of the burgh, and they—I mean the town—still hold, according to the averment in the case, and according to the assumption I am going to make, a part of the fishings in question. Another party—Mr Innes—holds a third part. These fishings were held in what are called "cobles"—I suppose the right being measured by the number of cobles which the holders, who were more or less numerous, were entitled to use. The fishing here was called the Four Cobles Fishing, and it is explained in the condescendence that the leading pursuers, Warrand's trustees, are the proprietors of three and a-third of these cobles. For the purpose of making this division more satisfactory I have taken the cobles in sixths. Three and a-third will make three and two-sixths; the town of Inverness are proprietors of three-sixths of a coble, and Mr Charles Innes, who is called as a defender here, is the proprietor of the remaining sixth. I repeat that their title to these fishings is not in dispute, except in so far as they allege it to be and ask us to declare it to be exclusive. The defender does formally in one of the pleas dispute their right, but it is only in a plea in law, and it was quite formally conceded in the debate before us from the outset that the defender did not dispute the pursuers' title to fish in the part of the river in question, but only maintained his own right, and disputed their right to interdict him. The question therefore is, whether the pursuers are entitled to have their right declared to be exclusive, and so to interdict and prohibit the defender from fishing within the specified bounds—that is, ex adverso of his lands below the cottage, the site of which I have referred to.

Now, what is the title of the defender? He is admittedly proprietor of the lands of Holme. That part of the lands of Holme ex adverso of a portion of which are the fishings in dispute he holds by a title proceeding from a subject superior, the Earl of Moray, under whom he holds. That part of the lands of Holme which are described in his title as proceeding from the Earl of Moray is a half of the lands of Holme. The other portion he holds under Mr Fraser of Balnain. It is explained by the pursuer in the first article of the condescendence "that the lands of Holme are held of different superiors and under separate titles, viz., one-half under the Earl of Moray and one-half under Mr Fraser of Balnain." There is an explanation added, to which I shall refer immediately, the point to which I call attention now being merely that the defender is proprietor of the whole lands of Holme—a half of the lands so described being derived from and held under the Earl of Moray, and the other half being derived from and held under Fraser of Balnain.

Now, the Earl of Moray, before he granted the one-half of the lands to the defender—or the predecessor of the defender, I should say—held them under a crown charter, in which they are described as "dimedietatem terrarum de Holme cum salmonu et aliis piscariis earundem in aqua de Nyss." That is all in the charter that need be attended to. That is the charter of one-half of the lands of Holme, with the salmon and other fishings thereof in the water of Ness. I may notice here—and I may take it in connection with the explanation of the pursuers in the first statement—that the title to the other half is derived in this way. I read from what is called a description of the half of Holme held by the Laird of Cawdor, now of Balnain—that is, from a sasine in favour of John Mackintosh of Holm, dated in 1706, following upon a precept of clare constat in his favour by William Campbell, Laird of Cawdor, in 1700, and it says—"Toto et integro dimidio villæ et terrarum de Holme, et dimidio molendini, earundem," and so on. There is nothing about the fishings. It is just half of the lands of Holme, I think, quite accurately translated.

Now, where these halves are situated does not appear from the title. It must be matter of evidence, and we have it as matter of evidence in this case. I take it really from the evidence of Mr Innes, to which I am not going to refer particularly, and it has this result. Upon the plan—to which Mr Innes refers in his evidence—the lands coloured green, and marked No. 4, are the one-half of the lands held of the Earl of Moray, and derived and held from him. The other half—the half held of Balnain—are No. 6.

Now, what are the fishings of the lands of Holme? We cannot discover that from the title of course; they must be ascertained otherwise. I read the description in the crown charter, which is in Latin, "fishings of the lands," salmon and other fishings of the lands. The title is to one-half of the land. The conveyance is—"Dimedietatis terrarum de Holme cum salmonu et aliis piscariis earundem in aqua de Nyss." In the sasine which we were referred to as the first sasine which was produced the description is—"Toto et integro dimidio villæ et terrarum de Holme et in dimidio molendini de Holme astrictis multuris et sequelis ejusdem cum dimidio salmonum piscarium super aqua de Ness ad dictas terras apertans"—that is, pertaining to those lands. What is the meaning of the grant of fishings here given? the fishings of the lands of Holme, or the one-half of the fishings pertaining to the said lands. If you are to construe a grant of the fishings pertaining to certain lands bordering on the river, I suppose that prima facie, and in the absence of anything satisfactory to the contrary, the grant would be taken to signify the fishings in the river ex adverso of the lands—pertaining to them—reaching to them—touching them. It might be shewn to be otherwise. The word "pertaining" might be taken in another sense on satisfactory evidence to that effect. It might be shewn by evidence that the fishings which were attached to certain lands in a title were not ex adverso of those lands at all, but were elsewhere; for salmon-fishings, being a royal privilege or franchise,—inter regalia,—may be alienated by the Crown without reference to any lands, or with reference to any lands whatever. They may be given in the same way. But in the absence of anything satisfactory to the contrary, a conveyance of fishings in a river appertaining to lands through which the river flows would clearly, in my opinion, be taken to mean the fishings in the river ex adverso of the lands. And so with respect to the half, if you take the grant to be of the half of the fishings pertaining to those lands, prima facie, and in the absence of anything to the contrary, it would be one-half of the fishings in the river ex adverso of those lands. Taking the fishings ex adverso as a whole, one-half of the fishings is thus conveyed. That does not even prima facie, certainly not necessarily, signify that the fishings are to be divided into two by measurement along the banks, the one half of the measurement being the one half, and the other half of the measurement being the other half. You ascertain as best you can what are the fishings appertaining to the lands in the absence of anything to the contrary, that being in my opinion the fishings ex adverso of the lands. In the case of the conveyance of the half, the fishings are divided into two, and the half only is conveyed. I am merely considering the matter of title at this moment. It is, in my opinion, clear, taking the conveyance of the Earl of Moray, and the sasine which we have in favour of the defender's predecessor upon that title, that his right under it was and now is to one-half of the lands of Holme—of the whole lands, that is—to be ascertained in the usual way, because there is no description in the title of one-half of the whole lands of Holme, and to one-half of the whole fishings pertaining to the whole lands. That is my opinion of the title; the defender has a title to one-half of the whole lands and one-half of the whole fishings thereto pertaining. It is not a title to one-half of the whole lands and one-half of the whole fishings appertaining to that half. There is no mention of fishings pertaining to one half or another half, and the pursuers say upon record that there are no fishings appertaining to the other half which the defender holds of Balnain. That is the case stated on record,—probably without much consideration of the matter or of what consequences it might lead to,—that the defender has no fishings pertaining to the half of the lands which he holds of Balnain, but has only fishings pertaining to the half held of the Earl of Moray.

Having made it thus clear what the title is according to my view, I proceed to consider the evidence. Let me—in order that there may be no dubiety about it—repeat the conclusion at which I arrive as to the state of the defender's title. I think he has a title to one half of the lands of Holme, held under Lord Moray, and I think he has a title to the other half of the lands of Holme held under Balnain. With respect to the fishing, I think he has under the crown grant to Lord Moray—regularly and properly transmitted to him—a title to one-half of the whole fishings pertaining to the whole lands of Holme. There is no grant of fishings in the title held under Balnain, and his title to fishings, so far as we see, stands upon the crown grant to the Earl of Moray, properly transmitted to him, of one-half of the fishings pertaining to the whole lands of Holme.

Now, I just point out here that in this case—except as matter of history and as throwing light upon what requires light—we have no concern with the fishings ex adverso of the lands held under Balnain. The pursuers lay no claim to these or to fish in the river ex adverso of the lands of Holme held under Balnain. How, upon a question between the parties interested in those fishings and having conflicting interests, the title might be held to stand in regard to possession or otherwise, I cannot tell. But, for the purposes of this case, I take it that the defender has a crown grant to one-half of the fishings ex adverso of the whole lands of Holme.

That title, however, might be lost a non utendo, and it might be acquired by some other party—that is to say, it might be lost to the one party by the negative prescription and acquired by another party by the positive prescription. I assume that to be quite possible. I am only speaking of the title before proceeding—as I shall immediately do—to consider the evidence of possession.

What, then, appears to have been the possession? It appears quite satisfactorily to my mind that the lairds of Holme have in all time to which the evidence extends asserted a right to fish ex adverso of the whole lands of Holme, and that under the title to one-half of the fishings pertaining to these lands, and which I must take—for the reasons I have stated, if there be nothing satisfactory and conclusive to the contrary—to mean the fishings ex adverso of the whole lands. In regard to the other half of the fishings pertaining to the lands of Holme, we have seen no title to any half except that which the defender has. I suppose, however, that there is another half, and that that half might be alienated by the Crown in any way and under any name. At all events it has not been alienated under the name of the half of the fishings pertaining to the lands of Holme. We have not the means of inquiring into that. I see there is a suggestion—and I think it is not without plausibility—in the course of the proceedings in 1843 before the Sheriff at the instance of Holme against a Mr Tait, who was a hairdresser and fishing-tackle dealer in Inverness. I suppose he had, as lessee, a right to the fishings which are now in the pursuers. Those proceedings were instituted in 1843 against him to stop him from fishing ex adverso of the lands of Holme, and particularly to stop him from fishing from the Holme lands at all. Well, there was this suggestion by his law-agent, Mr Duncan M'Lennan,—"On their own shewing"—that is, on the shewing of Holme—"they have only one half of the fishings attached to the lands of Holme, and there is nothing set forth in the petition inconsistent with the assumption that the other half belongs to the respondent, as the tenant of the lower heritors." The defender is the proprietor of one-half, and he is not maintaining an exclusive right, at least so far as the portion of water which alone is here in dispute is concerned. Whether or not he has an exclusive right further up, and if so, what that exclusive right to fish further up is to be attributed to, we are not now in a position to inquire, for we have not the parties in that question here. But what has been his possession? I repeat that he has, from as far back as memory can reach or evidence can go, by himself or his predecessors, asserted a right to fish ex adverso of the whole lands, and he has fished ex adverso of the whole lands. I cannot find any evidence here that he or his predecessors were ever stopped. Certainly they were never effectually stopped, and I do not find them challenged in fishing ex adverso of the whole lands. It so happened that the upper fishings were very much more valuable than the lower. If you take a stretch of a river extending along an estate, the probability is that the fishings at one point will be very much more valuable than the fishings at another part; and it so happens here that the fishings ex adverso of the lands held of Balnain are much more valuable—for they let for hundreds of pounds—than the fishings in question ex adverso of the lands held of the Earl of Moray, which are let for only £10 at this moment. But they were all possessed latterly—and for a quarter of a century at least—indeed for a good deal more they have been exclusively possessed for rod-fishing. I shall have a word to say by-and-bye about rod-fishing in questions in regard to salmon-fishings. But in the meantime, let me say that these fishings were let, and let for large rents, for more than a quarter of a century for rod-fishing; Mr Dennison, for instance, had them for upwards of twenty years, and paid £300 a-year for them. He was a fastidious fisher, and fished only the best water. But we have abundant evidence, in my opinion—and for myself I should not think it necessary to go beyond the evidence of Mr Mackintosh himself and Mr Innes—that continuously these fishings were possessed as far down as the lands extended, although chiefly by rod-fishing. There was never much coble-fishing; latterly, I think, there was none at all except at the very end of the season, when there was a sort of gala-day. At the same time there was a little coble-fishing, and coble-fishing down to the very end of the property. There is the evidence of Alexander Fraser and of Mr Mackintosh himself. They speak to a good deal of net-fishing below as well as above. Alexander Fraser says,—"I remember Mr Weekes, an Englishman, having the Holme fishings. He fished with the net. I was one of his crew. He liked us to fish for an hour or two at night. I have seen him net the river down to Ness Cottage. He could not net Redbraes, because there were stakes in it, but I have seen him net below that. I remember when the Ness Club was in existence. I fished the river with them one night with the net on the Holme side, beginning at the Saltoun march and going down to Kessock Ferry at the mouth of the river." There was some trespass in that if it was not done by permission, although it probably was done by permission. Then he goes on,—"Donald Nichol was present. I was not regularly employed by the club—perhaps an hour to-night and two hours to-morrow night, and so on. Cross.—When we netted the lower water we dragged the boat back; we did not use a cart. Mr Weekes was not the last who netted the disputed water. I think Tait netted it after that."

"There is some ambiguity" is the expression which the Lord Ordinary uses about the possession. He proceeds on the footing that both parties have had possession, but there is an obscurity in the evidence as to the facts on possession. There seems to have been an interchange of courtesies and civilities—each party giving rights to the other. Even the public were tolerated, and tolerated with boats to a considerable extent. There is therefore some confusion in the matter of possession, but I should have no hesitation in pronouncing as my verdict on the evidence that there has been continuous uninterrupted possession by the lairds of Holme of the salmon-fishings in the river Ness,—that is to say, that they have continuously and uninterruptedly fished salmon in the river Ness along the whole of the course ex adverso of their lands.

An argument was stated to us that no possession was to be looked to or was of any legal value except possession by net and coble. I desire to say distinctly that I am not of that opinion. I quite assent to the proposition that we have authority, which I shall not go back upon, which goes this length, that a general grant of fishings shall not be converted or explained into a grant of salmon-fishings by mere fishing with the rod. We have no case here to consider about explaining a general grant of fishing to mean a grant of salmon-fishing. That is not the kind of case before us at all. Where there is a general grant of fishing it has been held—and I repeat that I shall not be disposed to question the decisions, or the grounds on which they stood, or to go back upon them—that that shall not be explained into a grant of salmon-fishings by saying that the grantee fished or that his successors fished for salmon with the rod. That is not positivi juris, but a conclusion reached upon rational and intelligible grounds, or, to speak in the singular, upon a rational and intelligible ground, the ground being that fishing by net and coble was at the date of those decisions regarded as the only serious mode of salmon-fishing. The people of that day would have opened their eyes with some amazement if they had heard of £200 or £300 a-year being paid for fishing by rod in the river ex adverso of the lands held of Balnain, but a great deal has occurred in modern times, and now the most profitable use which can be made of salmon-fishings in many places is to abolish the fishing by net and coble altogether, and to hire out the fishings to tenants for rod-fishing only. Although no such question arises before us, I am not at all prepared to say that I should not hold a general grant of fishing to be explained by possession into a grant of salmon-fishing by such commercial and profitable use as could be had of it,—for instance by letting it out for rod-fishing at those great rents to which I have referred. What I say at present, however, is that the decisions about explaining a general grant into a special grant of salmon-fishing proceed upon a rational and intelligible ground, and not upon a rule positivi juris that there must be net and coble-fishing. Net and coble-fishing may go out of existence altogether, and another mode of fishing quite foreign to net and coble—although perhaps, a more profitable use of the salmon-fishings—may come into existence, and to say that then a grant of fishing cannot possibly be explained into a grant of salmon-fishing at all would in my opinion be extravagant. As I have already said, however, we have no case of that kind here. We are only considering whether what is prima facie and on the face of it a good title to salmon-fishing in a particular part of the river will be lost non utendo because the person holding the title has only fished for salmon with the rod. I could not assent to such a proposition for a moment. It would come to this, that if a man who had, as here, an admitted indisputable grant of salmon-fishings ex adverso of his land, chose to take the most profitable use of his fishing by means of rod-fishing he might lose the subject of the grant, while another proprietor, on the opposite side of the river, with a similar grant applicable to his side, might acquire the whole of it, because he had simply fished his part of the stream by net and coble. The man who lets his fishings for rod-fishing may make hundreds, or it may be thousands, a-year. It seems that rents have gone that length. They may do that continuously now. Now, to say that he, who has thus never ceased to utilise his fishings in the best way, was liable to lose his right of salmon-fishing a non utendo on the mere ground that he did not fish with net and coble, would in my opinion be extravagant.

But if I am right that there is a prima facie good title to salmon-fishing ex adverso of these lands, the question is whether the possession has not been such that it has been lost to this party and acquired by another. Now, even if his fishing had been confined to the rod, which I think it was not, I do not think that consequence would have followed. That is the view in which the case presents itself to my mind. I think there is a good title to begin with. I think that title has throughout and without interruption been acted upon. There is no ground for maintaining that there has been any abandonment of the right. Therefore I think there is no ground upon which we can cut out the defender by declaring the pursuers' right to be exclusive, and so interdicting him from fishing there at their instance. I think that would be unjust. I think he properly failed in interdicting Mr Tait in 1843. Of course, in saying that, I assume that the same title in Tait's authors was exhibited which the pursuers are exhibiting here. I think it is a good title. The defender himself thinks it is a good title, and never contended for a moment before us to the contrary effect. There was therefore a proper failure of the attempt to stop Tait in 1843. I think there is an equally good title and an equally available possession put before us here, and just as the defender in 1843 failed to turn out Tait and to prevent him from fishing, so I am for giving no countenance to their attempt now to interdict the defender.

I have only a word to say on the view on which the Lord Ordinary proceeded. I think he proceeds on the assumption that both parties have had possession, and have been continuously in possession. He thinks the evidence explains the defender's title, so that the salmon-fishings under it are ex adverso of the lands held under Balnain, and not ex adverso of those acquired from and held under the Earl of Moray. I do not assent to that view. I have stated already that prima facie in my opinion, and in the absence of anything satisfactory to the contrary, the fishings pertaining to the lands must be taken to be the fishings ex adverso of those lands. I am taking the case where the lands are on the river bank, and I think there is nothing here satisfactory—I myself happen to think there is nothing even plausible to the contrary; for the other view is this, that when the Crown granted the lands on the lower part of the river as one-half of the lands of Holme with the fishings pertaining thereto, the meaning of that was that these were the fishings ex adverso of the other half of the lands situated up the river, which were not—I mean the lands—the subject of the grant at all. So that the Laird of Holme is in this position that he has the undisputed possession and an indisputable right to the fishings ex adverso of the lands which he has without any grant of fishings at all, but no right to the fishings ex adverso of the lands which he has with that grant. That is a little paradoxical, and I do not assent to it. But it is sufficient to say that in my opinion, for the reasons which I have endeavoured to explain, the pursuers must fail here. I should sustain the defences in so far as they do not proceed upon a denial of the pursuers' right, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action. We do not need to declare the pursuers' right to fish on those lands. We only need to negative their exclusive right which they ask us to declare, and upon declaring which they ask us to interdict. We cannot define the respective rights of the parties to use the banks on the one side or on the other. We can only proceed on the view on which this action is presented.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—By crown charter dated 1st January 1591, King James VI. conveyed to the town of Inverness, inter alia,—"Totam et integram aquam de Ness, omnesque partes ac utrumque latus ejusdem, inter lapidem vocat Clashnahagaig et mare, cum omnibus piscationibus et piscariis, tam salmonum quam aliorum piscium." The pursuers, along with Mr Charles Innes, are now in right of this grant. It is not disputed that infeftment followed in favour of the burgh, and that the title of the pursuers and Mr Innes has been properly deduced. For the sake of simplicity I shall speak of these fishings as if the pursuers were the sole proprietors. That Mr Innes holds a part is not in any way material. The legal meaning of such a grant is not doubtful. It conveys the whole salmon-fishings within the specified limits with a right to fish on both sides of the river. So far there is no controversy.

It appears, however, that by a crown charter dated 1st June 1566, Henry and Mary conveyed to the Earl of Moray "dimidietatem terrarum de Holme cum salmonum et aliis piscariis earundem in aqua de Nyss." No infeftment following on this charter has been produced. But there is a "ratification to the Earl of Moray of his infeftment" granted by Parliament on 5th June 1592, by which is ratified the charter of 1st June 1566, and the precept of sasine following thereon. We do not, however, see whether the infeftment contained the half of the lands of Holme and the fishings thereof which are mentioned in the charter.

The lands of Holme came into the present family by two different titles—one half from the Earl of Moray, the other half from the Laird of Calder. The former half still continues to be held of Lord Moray. The other is now held of Mr Fraser of Balnain. On 4th September 1706 the Earl of Moray granted a precept of clare in favour of John Mackintosh of Holme, "toto et integro dimidio villæ et terrarum de Holme . . . cum dimidio salmonum piscarium super aqua de Ness." This right is continued in the successors of the grantee till the present time. With the other half of the lands of Holme flowing from the Laird of Calder no right of salmon-fishings is conveyed.

The titles standing thus, the pursuers seek declarator that they are the proprietors of the whole salmon-fishings in their grant, with two exceptions, which I shall notice hereafter. On the other hand, the defender claims the salmon-fishings ex adverso of his lands of Holme within the limits of the pursuers' grant, although at the discussion he admitted that he could only maintain that he had a joint right along with the pursuers.

The first point to consider is, whether there is any competing title. The defender maintains that his title is preferable to that of the pursuers in respect that it is of an earlier date. If this point is to be made, the infeftment of the Earl of Moray should have been produced, because there can be no competing title without competing infeftments. But I am willing to take the case on the footing that the infeftment of the Earl was conform to his charter, and to examine the title on that footing.

When salmon-fishings are given out along with lands the meaning of the grant is that the grantee has a right to fish ex adverso of his lands, and from his lands. Such a grant may support a larger or different possession. But on the face of the title it means no more than what I have stated.

The charter in favour of Lord Moray would thus import a right to the fishings ex adverso of that half of the lands of Holme which belonged to him. The title in the person of the defender is more limited, though perhaps more accurate in its expression. For he holds only one-half of the salmon-fishings of the lands of Holme. Under that title he can never have more than one-half of these fishings, nor, in my opinion, would the title support a prescriptive right to the whole. But judging by the title alone, I should be disposed to hold that the fishings were the fishings ex adverso of that part of the lands held of Lord Moray. So far therefore there is a competing title. For it seems that the lands held of Lord Moray form the lower portion of the lands of Holme, and in so far as the pursuers claim the fishings ex adverso of these there appears to be another title, and it may be a prior title, in the person of the defender.

But questions of this kind which relate to grants of so ancient a date can never be satisfactorily decided by reference to the title alone. We must see what has been possessed under the title. Nor must we forget that salmon-fishings are not a part and pertinent of lands. They are a separatum tenementum, and though the construction of a title may be as I have stated, possession may shew that the situation of the fishings is elsewhere. When salmon-fishings are given out by a crown grant, the possession which has followed upon it is, I think, decisive as to the locality of the fishings.

Turning then to the possession which has followed on the grant of the pursuers, I find that the pursuers have possessed for time immemorial the fishings from the Clachnahagaig stone to the sea, and that they have drawn their nets on both sides of the river. So entirely does the defender admit this to be the state of possession, that he does not now claim an exclusive right to the fishings ex adverso of the lands of Holme, in so far as these fishings are below the Clachnahagaig stone, but only a joint right along with the defenders. The claim of the pursuers being so far admitted, it only remains to inquire whether the defender has established the joint right for which he contends.

The first question which I put is this—What are the Holme fishings? I do not find it to be suggested that these fishings are situated elsewhere than ex adverso of the lands of Holme. It is not said that any other fishings have been possessed as such, and in the absence of such possession as will shew that they are in another locality, I take it to be clear that the words "the salmon-fishings of the lands of Holme" must receive their ordinary legal interpretation, and that they mean nothing else and no more than the fishings ex adverso of that estate.

Of these fishings the defender is infeft in one-half. What has been his possession under that title?

The lands of Holme lie above and below the Clachnahagaig stone. In so far as they are above that stone, the defender and his predecessors have possessed the salmon-fishings ex adverso of these lands. It would appear, as I have said, that the lower portion of the lands are held under the title flowing from Lord Moray, and the higher under the title flowing from the Laird of Calder. But as salmon-fishings are a separatum tenementum, and not a part and pertinent of lands, I hold that the possession which the defender and his predecessors have had has identified the fishings which were granted to them by Lord Moray. The defender has no other title to these fishings than his charter from Lord Moray, and I think that it is sufficient. Nor would it benefit the defender to have any doubt thrown on that right in order to his success in the present action. For the fishings which he has possessed are very valuable, and comprise in extent fully one-half of the fishings of Holme, while the fishings below the Clachnahagaig stone, though the subject of this action, are worth very little.

But the defender says that he has also possessed jointly with the pursuers the fishings opposite that portion of Holme below the stone, so that according to his contention he has possessed the whole salmon-fishings opposite Holme—the upper portion exclusively, the lower portion jointly with the pursuers. In his defences he claims the whole fishings opposite Holme, and subject to the joint right which he now concedes to the pursuers his present claim goes as far. For if the joint right of the pursuers be allowed, such a right is an excision from the whole fishings of Holme, and not from one-half of these fishings. The claim of the defender is therefore in my opinion not supported by his title, unless it were to be held contrary to his interests, and contrary to what I take to be the fair legal inference, that the upper fishings, which he has undoubtedly possessed, are not within it.

I may, however, put that question aside, for I do not think that it is proved that he has possessed the lower fishings.

In 1843 the defender raised a process of interdict against Tait, the tacksman of the fishings of the town of Inverness, to have him interdicted from fishing from the lands of Holme so far as below Clachnahagaig stone. He obtained interim interdict. We have before us the proof which was led for the respondent.

The petitioner did not adduce any. It seems to me that that proof shews very conclusively that the town of Inverness had the exclusive possession of the whole fishings contained in the grant of 1591, and that the defender did not possess any part of the fishings which he now claims. It is unnecessary for me to examine it, for it is all one way. Both Holme and the town fishings were sometimes held by one tenant. But the boundaries of each were well known, and are very precisely described. For instance, the witness Macnaughton, who was tenant for a year of the Holme fishings under the grandfather of the defender, tells us that when he took the fishings his landlord pointed out the march between the Holme fishings and the town's fishings. The march was opposite the Clachnahagaig stone. When the fishings were in different hands I think that it is proved that this march was observed. The defender has in this action led evidence as to the state of possession prior to 1843. But before this was done nearly a half century had elapsed, and it is obvious from this consideration alone that the evidence adduced by the present pursuers in the process of interdict is much more reliable. As it is, I think that the defender has failed to shew that his predecessors possessed the fishings in question. There may have been occasional fishing on their part, but to my mind there was no possession in any reasonable sense of the word.

There can, I think, be but one inference from the proof as applicable to this date. I hold that prior to 1843 the town of Inverness had immemorial possession of the fishings within their grant. Such possession was not necessary to establish their right to these fishings except as against a competing title. But if, as the possession has I think shewn, the fishings conveyed by Lord Moray to the predecessors of the defender are the upper fishings of the lands of Holme, there is no competing title, because the title of the defender is satisfied by what was possessed under it, and because he could not claim under that title the whole fishings of Holme. But as the town had possessed the fishings which were granted to them, it seems to be completely established that they were at the date I have mentioned the exclusive proprietors of these fishings.

If this be so, the defender can only maintain that he has acquired the joint right which he now claims by subsequent possession. Salmon-fishings may undoubtedly be acquired in this way, and so be lost by a former owner. There are examples in our books. But the title must be sufficient and the possession must be very clear. I do not think the defender's title is sufficient, and I am of opinion that the necessary possession has not been proved.

The most favourable way of stating the case for the defender is that he has possessed the fishings for twenty years prior to the raising of this action, which is the shorter prescriptive period introduced by the recent statute in place of the period of forty years. The time between 1843 and 1853 may be thrown out of view, for the process of interdict, though not actively proceeded with, was still in existence, and was not taken out of Court till 1853. While the case was sub judice the action of either party is not material. But even if it were, I do not think that the defender has proved possession in any satisfactory way during that period, and whatever possession he had was due to the interim interdict which he had improperly obtained in 1843, and which was not recalled till 1853.

As to the alleged possession since that time we are not in doubt. The defender himself says,—"Since 1853 the fishings have been used entirely as rod fishings." He adds,—"During that time they were almost continually let." His tenants were Mr Weekes, Mr Reeve, Mr Dennison, and latterly, as regards the lower fishings, Mr Innes. The first two gentlemen held the fishings from 1853 till 1867—Mr Dennison from 1867 till 1879—and Mr Innes from that year to the present date, though it would appear that he was allowed to fish in the lower fishings a year or two earlier. It appears from the evidence that Mr Reeve and Mr Weekes only occasionally angled in the lower water, and that Mr Dennison never fished there at all. Mr Innes fished it may be said regularly, but it is important to notice that for a considerable part of his tenancy he was a part proprietor of the fishings which had belonged to the town, and had thus a right to angle independently of his lease from the defender. It is said that Mr Weekes occasionally netted the lower water. At the best, this netting was only occasional. But as it appears that he netted from the Holme fishings to the sea, his acts prove nothing. For it is clear that he either fished by tolerance, or that he held other rights than those which he derived from the defender.

In my opinion such possession as the defender has proved cannot prescribe a right to salmon fishings. It has only been occasional, and certainly not continuous. For twelve years, from 1867 till 1879, there was no possession at all. It is of no consequence that the fishings were let, possession must follow on the lease. For possession is the only mode of asserting a right, and the only means by which a right can be prescribed.

A possession so uncertain, occasional, and ambiguous, cannot in my opinion deprive the pursuers of the right which they hold under their charter. Further, it was by rod only, and I hold it to be settled in this Court, that where salmon-fishings can be fished by net and coble, mere angling cannot establish a prescriptive right—Richmond, 8 Macph. 530. The principle on which this rule depends is not difficult to discover. It is nothing more than this—that when a right is claimed by prescriptive possession, complete possession must be asserted and proved, and that acts which fall short of complete possession will be ascribed to tolerance, and will not be regarded as the assertion of a right on the one hand nor as the recognition of a right on the other.

I said in an early part of my opinion that there are fishings within the limits of their grant which the pursuers do not claim. The origin of these exceptions has not been well explained. The defender argued from their existence that there was reason to suppose that the fishings of Holme might be also excepted. I do not pursue the argument. At the best it lays hold on a mere presumption, and the considerations on which I found my judgment are in my opinion quite sufficient to displace it.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a perplexing case in any view, and after the opinions your Lordships have delivered it of course assumes a very important and difficult character, but I agree in the result at which Lord Young has arrived, and substantially upon the grounds which he has fully explained. I shall only add a few sentences to indicate where I think the real difference of opinion turns, and the grounds upon which it ought to be resolved.

The town of Inverness and the proprietor of the lands of Holme are the proprietors of the ground on the banks of the river Ness. They both have grants of great antiquity of salmon-fishings in that water, the lands of Holme being above and the town of Inverness below. The grant in favour of Holme goes back as far as 300 years. It was a grant by Queen Mary and her husband Darnley in 1566. I do not think there is much doubt as to the terms of the grant or as to the right which it conveyed. That is the earliest grant which we have before us in the case. It substantially gives one-half of the lands of Holme and the fishings thereof. We have no sasine upon that grant, but it was ratified in Parliament in 1592. We have no sasine on it indeed for 150 years, but in 1706 on a precept of clare constat we have an infeftment, and it is made to run in this way,—" half of the lands of Holme and half of the fishings." I cannot for one moment imagine that that can be construed to mean anything else than the lands intended to be conveyed by the original grant. Therefore I apprehend that the title is quite sufficient, provided it is established by the subsequent possession. The Lord Ordinary says that the title of the burgh of Inverness should prevail, or have more favour in this inquiry, because there are physical limits pointed out as the boundary of the right. There is a stone called Clachnahagaig referred to in the title, which is said to be one boundary of the town's right, but unfortunately for that view there are other boundaries described. It is said the town is to have the right from that stone to the sea, but it is quite certain that they have not the right to the whole fishings from that stone to the sea, because there are the Duke of Gordon's Fishings, and the Friar's Shot Fishings, between them and the sea. I do not think the town's fishings depend so much, however, upon the state of the subsequent possession as the Holme fishings do, and in truth, dealing as we are with titles of that antiquity, and in a matter where possession is necessary to explain the title of the assertor of the right, I imagine that the real truth of the case must be found in inquiring into the nature of the possession which has been exercised.

Now, in 1843 the Laird of Holme brought an action of interdict before the Sheriff to have it found that he had exclusive possession of this part of the water ex adverso of the lands of Holme. A circumstance occurred which prevented the present defender from going on with that process of interdict, but the respondent went on in his absence, and we have a body of evidence led at that time for the purpose of rebutting the averments made by the petitioner. That process, however, came to nothing. The evidence is here. It is good as far as it goes, but it is evidence which was led without a contradictor. We have only one side of the case and not the other, and although I am far from saying that the evidence is not admissible in this inquiry, I think it can only be taken in the view of the observations which I have made.

From 1851 or 1852 until now matters have remained much as they were. They have, however, always been in dispute. It is plain from the evidence taken in the 1843 inquiry that there was always a difference between the town and Holme in regard to this matter. It was never admitted on the one side or the other who had the right, and now that the question is fairly raised at last we have to determine what the limits of both these parties upon this water are.

It seems to be assumed that the evidence adduced in 1843 proved exclusive possession on the part of the town. I am very clearly of the opposite opinion. I think the evidence in 1843 proved that there was not exclusive possession, and that there could not be. I think so upon one very simple ground. That ground is, that for a great majority of years—for twenty years prior to that time—the fishings had been in the same hands—the same man was tacksman of Holme and tacksman of the town of Inverness, and the fishings were held together and worked together. This made it quite impossible that the possession under such a state of matters could become exclusive. The evidence is quite distinct that while Mr Stevenson, who for certainly three-quarters of the time held the fishings of Holme and the fishings of the town, was tenant no marches whatever were observed. That is proved by Mr Hutchison. He says that "Mr Stevenson still continued the tenant of the Holme fishings; that the crews below sometimes went up to the said march to fish; that Mr Stevenson got the whole fishings afterwards, and the deponent gave himself no trouble thereafter about marches." The same thing is repeated by the witness Mackenzie, who was sixty years of age when the proof was led in 1843. He says that "when Stevenson got the Holme pool he fished the river as it suited his purpose, having had the whole of it from the lower march of Lady Saltoun's fishings." There are many other passages of the same description. The real state of the matter is, that Mr Stevenson got the town fishings in 1820 and the Holme fishings in 1821, and until 1830 he substantially held and worked them all together. He got into difficulties in 1830, and there was a year or two when Mr Stevenson had no concern with the fishings at all, but in 1833 he apparently came back, and the same thing took place until 1838 or 1839. So that it is quite clear that on the evidence in the inquiry of 1843 there could not by possibility have been established an exclusive right on the part of the town. That being the state of the matter, it is admitted that the evidence in this action does not establish an exclusive right on the part of the town. It is ambiguous, and the Lord Ordinary admits that it is so. He holds mainly that a particular limit —the limit of the town's right—is established by the original grant. But I think that that was all subject to possession. On the grounds I have stated I think there has been no exclusive possession proved in favour of the town of Inverness. I do not think it necessary to go further than that.

I may say in regard to the matter of rod-fishing that I do not think it is doubtful in the slightest degree that if you have a crown grant of salmon-fishings, and find it more profitable to fish with the rod than with a coble, that is as good a possession as if you found it more profitable to fish the other way. But the difficulty that was suggested was this, that where there is no grant of salmon-fishings the mere angling for salmon will not be held sufficient to change a right cum piscationibus, or to enlarge it into a right of salmon-fishings.

After the full consideration your Lordships have given to the case, I do not think it is necessary to say more. The defenders will therefore be assoilzied.

Nicolson v. Macandrew & Co.

Relevancy.—A labourer who was employed by Messrs A & B, a firm of masons, in the erection of certain buildings, brought an action of damages for personal injury against Messrs C & D, the principal contractors for the work, alleging that, in order to perform his duty of mixing lime, he had had occasion to fetch his shovel, which he had lent to another mason who was working at some distance from the ground; that in fetching it he ascended a ladder which led on to a scaffolding belonging to the defenders; that when he was passing over the scaffolding it gave way, and he fell to the ground receiving severe injuries. Held that as it was not alleged that the scaffolding had been erected for the benefit of the masons, or that it had been used by them with the authority or sanction of the defenders, no relevant case was averred, and action accordingly dismissed.

1st Division.

Sheriff of Aberdeen.

M.

John Nicolson brought an action of damages for personal injury against D. Macandrew & Company in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen. The averments were, inter alia, as follows:—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is a crofter and labourer, presently residing in Skye. For about two months prior to Monday the 10th day of October 1887 he was in the employment of Messrs Gauld & M'Kenzie, masons, as a labourer at the Government Prison Works, Peterhead. The defenders were the principal contractors for the work in which the pursuer then laboured, and themselves executed part thereof. The pursuer was subject to the control of the defenders, and his labour was in their service. His wages were paid by one in the defenders' employment, who paid the wages of all the workmen in common." (Cond. 2) "In the forenoon of the said 10th day of October 1887 the pursuer, in order to perform his duty of mixing lime, had to fetch his shovel, which was the only one available for the purpose, and was then with a mason named Clark. To reach Clark, who was working at a considerable height from the ground, on the inside of a wall, forming one of the sides of a gateway, it was necessary to ascend a ladder which leant against the outside of the said wall, and which also adjoined and gave access to a joiners' scaffolding erected on that side of the wall, about 15 feet from the ground. The pursuer had formerly obtained his shovel from Clark by passing up the said ladder and along the said scaffolding. On the present occasion, with the like purpose, he was on the ladder, when a joiner, in the defenders' employment, who was returning to work on the said scaffolding, came up behind the pursuer and told him to stand aside. The pursuer accordingly stepped on to the scaffolding, where two joiners were already working, and allowed the third joiner to pass him. Immediately thereafter, when the pursuer was returning to the ladder, the said scaffolding suddenly gave way and fell to the ground, with the three joiners and the pursuer. With reference to the statement in answer, it is averred that the pursuer had a right to make use of the said ladder, and to be on said scaffolding." The action was laid both upon the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and at common law.

The defenders averred, inter alia, that "the ladder was placed in the position stated, by the defenders' own workmen, for their own sole and exclusive use, and that the pursuer had no right to make use of said ladder or to be on said scaffolding."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having sustained loss, injury, and damage through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, is entitled to damages and solatium from the defenders. (2) The pursuer having been injured in the defenders' service by their negligence and through the defective condition of a scaffolding in use by them, is entitled to compensation from the defenders for his said injuries, and the loss and suffering consequent thereon.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is irrelevant, et

No. 156. — July 7, 1888. Nicolson v. Macandrew & Co.

separatim, is irrelevant under the Employers Liability Act, in respect that, according to the pursuer's averments, the relation of master and servant, in the sense of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, did not exist between the pursuer and the defenders. (2) The pursuer not having been in the employment of the defenders, nor under the orders or instructions of them, or of anyone for whom they are responsible, is not entitled to claim compensation from them, and the action should therefore be dismissed, with expenses. (4) The accident having been caused by the pursuer's own fault in going upon said scaffolding, where he had no right to be, he is barred personali exceptione from insisting on any claim for compensation for the injuries alleged.

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), on 1st June 1888, allowed a proof, and the pursuer then appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session for jury trial.

The defenders argued that the action was irrelevant. I. In order to constitute a relevant action under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, it was necessary that the parties to it should stand to one another in the relation of employer and employee. This was evident both from the title of the Act, which was to extend and regulate the liability of employers for injuries to workmen " in their service," and from the words of the first section. It appeared also from the definition of " workman" in the statute; and the cases of Morrison and Robertson,[1] though the decision in the former allowed an action to be maintained notwithstanding the fact that the relation of master and servant was not direct, were authorities for the proposition that there must be some relevant averment of service between the person injured and the person sued as liable for the injury. Such was not the nature of this action. The pursuer's employers were represented to be Messrs Gauld & M'Kenzie, and the action was not brought against them. II. There was no relevant case stated at common law. The pursuer had no occasion to go upon the scaffolding to mix his lime, which was the duty he had to perform. It was not said that he had been invited to go there, or that he had even been permitted to do so. Brady's case[2] was different; there the pursuer was in the bona fide belief that by entering the premises where he met with the accident he would get the goods he wanted, and he had been directed by one of the employees to go there.

Argued for the pursuer;—I. The pursuer really had two employers here. The defenders were the principal contractors for the work in which he was engaged, and it was they who paid the pursuer his wages. That was enough to satisfy the requirements of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, and the word employment must not be too strictly interpreted. But there was a liability here apart from the relation of master and servant. The plant had been inadequate, and there had been a duty upon the defenders to supply sufficient scaffolding, which they had neglected. II. In any case, a relevant case at common law had been set out.[3]

Lord President.—In so far as this action is laid upon the Employers Liability Act, I am of opinion that it cannot be maintained. An action under that Act must be brought by a servant or employee, and must be brought against his master or employer. Here the averment is—(Cond. 1) " The pursuer is a crofter and labourer, presently residing in Skye. For about two months prior to Monday the 10th day of October 1887 he was in the employment of Messrs Gauld & M'Kenzie, masons, as a labourer at the Government Prison Works, Peterhead. The defenders were the principal contractors for the work in which the pursuer then laboured, and themselves executed part thereof. The pursuer was subject to the control of the defenders, and his labour was in their service. His wages were paid by one in the defenders' employment, who paid the wages of all the workmen in common." As regards the latter part of the article it is not very explicit or intelligible, but I take it to mean that the defenders, who were the principal contractors, had control of the work of the subcontractors in the way of directing where the labour of the latter was to be expended, and that that labour was for the promotion of the contract on which the principal contractors were engaged, and that the wages of the employees of the subcontractors were paid by the principal contractors. These circumstances, if separately averred, would not of themselves amount to a constitution of the relation of employer and employee under the Employers Liability Act; but we are not left in this case to draw that inference, for we have it distinctly averred by the pursuer that he is in the employment of Messrs Gauld & M'Kenzie, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, he is here suing the defenders as his employers. These two things are inconsistent, and accordingly I think the action is irrelevant under the Employers Liability Act.

But a separate case is attempted to be made out at common law, and it seems to me to amount to this, that the pursuer had lent a shovel to a fellow-workman, who was like himself employed in the mason work of the building; that he found it necessary to get back the tool, and for that purpose proceeded to climb a ladder which was laid against one of the walls, and then to pass along a scaffolding, which was erected, according to his allegation, not for the use of the masons, but of the joiners. It is not averred that workmen other than the joiners were in the habit of walking along the scaffolding with the permission of the defenders, or that they had occasion to use it. The record simply stands upon the averment that the pursuer had once before done the same thing for the purpose of recovering possession of his shovel from the same man. I do not see that there can be any common law liability, the scaffolding not having been erected for the use of the masons. If it had been averred that although erected primarily for the joiners it was used by all the workmen with the authority and sanction of the defenders, that would have been a different case. But reading the averments as we find them, I am of opinion that the action is bad at common law also.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with your Lordship upon both branches of the case.

In the first place, I think that in order to found an action on the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the pursuer must set forth the existence of the relation of employer and servant between himself and the defender. The title of the Act is "to extend and regulate the liability of employers to make compensation for personal injuries suffered by workmen in their service," and the whole provisions of the 1st section of the Act, which introduces the change upon the common law, on which the pursuer founds, deal with injuries which are brought about, either through defects in the plant used in the employer's business, or through the negligence of persons in the service of the employer. In the present case the pursuer avers that he was in the employment, not of the defenders, but of Messrs Gauld & M'Kenzie, who were doing a special work for the defenders. Accordingly, any action at the pursuer's instance under the Employers Liability Act must be directed against Messrs Gauld & M'Kenzie. The decision in the case of Morrison v. Baird & Company (10 R. 271) does not in the least derogate from that principle. There the pursuer averred that he was in the employment of the defenders. The rubric to the report of that case very properly states that the pursuer's averment was "that the working of the pit was carried on under the superintendence of a general and of an underground manager, appointed by the defenders, that the defenders were in the habit of arranging with certain of their men to excavate portions of the limestone at a certain rate per ton, and authorising them to employ the necessary workmen; that at the date of the accident one of the faces of the pit was wrought under such an arrangement by J. M.; that the pursuer's husband was engaged under J. M. as a workman; that while so employed he was killed by a fall of rock through the fault of the defenders, or of the general manager, or of the underground manager, or of J. M." No doubt the averments in that case were very loose, but they came to this, that the person who did employ the pursuer was an agent of the defenders, who were accordingly in reality the employers, and accordingly that was a case where an issue was very properly granted under the Employers Liability Act.

In the second place, I am further of opinion that, as the pursuer has not alleged that he was called upon to use the scaffolding for the purposes of any work for the defenders, he has no case at common law against them. He was in no different position from a stranger, who could not, in my opinion, have maintained an action of this kind on such averments as the pursuer makes as to the purpose with which he went on the scaffold. Where an employer erects a scaffolding for the use of particular workmen who are to come upon it, and where others, having no duty to perform there, take advantage of it, they do so at their own risk. If the pursuer had stated that he had been in the habit of using the scaffolding as an access to some part of the premises where he had duty to perform, and had done so in the knowledge and with the sanction of the defenders, a different case, as your Lordship has pointed out, would have been made. But no such case has been disclosed. The case of Brady v. Parker (14 R. 783) falls to be distinguished. It proceeded upon the law which was most forcibly stated in the English case of Indermaur v. Dames (1867, L. R., 2 C. P. 311). It was an extension of the principle of that authority to apply it to the case of a person who went to a store for the purpose of buying articles which he believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, were sold there, but which it ultimately turned out were not so sold. That was Brady's case. It was decided on the view that he was invited into the premises, and went there as an intending purchaser, and having met with an accident in so doing the defender was held liable. In order to make the case of the present pursuer relevant, it was necessary for him to aver either invitation from the defender, or some act inferring sanction on his part to use the scaffolding.

LORD ADAM.—I concur upon both points.

LORD MURE was absent.

THE COURT sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

MRS HELEN STEEL STEWART OR HENDERSON, Pursuer (Appellant).—Shaw—Steele.

WILLIAM MUNN, Defender (Respondent).—A. S. D. Thomson.

Lease—House becoming uninhabitable—Liability of landlord for death in tenant's family.—In an action by the tenant of a house against her landlord, the pursuer averred that she had been tenant of the house, from year to year, since Whitsunday 1883; that in August 1887, she "experienced most disagreeable smells in the house, and it was discovered that the sanitary arrangements and drains were defective" (the particulars not being specified); that she complained to the defender, who declined to do anything; that "as the disagreeable smells still continued," she in September 1887 "lodged a complaint with the sanitary authorities, and the complaint was intimated to the defender" who "paid no, or at least insufficient, attention to" the complaint (the nature of which the pursuer did not specify on record), that "through the effects of the insanitary condition of said house the pursuer and her family suffered in health, and three of her children became ill of diphtheria, whereof two of them" died in January 1888; that she was in the habit of letting the house, but that some of the families to whom she let it in 1887 had to leave owing to its insanitary condition, and that she herself was also under the necessity of leaving from the same cause. She therefore pleaded that she was entitled to damages from the defender, and to solatium for the loss of her two children. Held that the action was irrelevant from want of specification.

Observed (per Lord Young) that where tenants continue to inhabit a house which they believe to be dangerous to health through the fault of the landlord they cannot hold him responsible for any evil consequence arising from the continued occupation.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.
I.

IN March 1888 Mrs Helen Steel Stewart or Henderson brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Rothesay against William Munn for decree for £1000.

After revisal of the pleadings the pursuer's averments stood as follows;—(Rev. cond. 2) "The said deceased William Dunlop Henderson and the pursuer were tenants from year to year from and after the term of Whitsunday 1883 of a house belonging to the defender, and situated at Demerara Place, 32 Ardbeg Road, Rothesay." (Rev. cond. 3) "It was a special or implied condition of the occupancy of said house by the late W. Dunlop Henderson and the pursuer that it was habitable, and that the drains and general condition of the house, as regards sanitary arrangements, were satisfactory and unobjectionable." (Rev. cond. 4) "In or about the month of August 1887 the pursuer and her family experienced most disagreeable smells in the house, and it was discovered that the sanitary arrangements and drains were defective. Intimation of this was at once made to the defender, who was several times called upon to have the matter remedied, but notwithstanding of the repeated complaints by the pursuer, defender maintained that there was nothing requiring attention, and he did nothing to remedy the defects complained of. The said deceased W. D. Henderson had occasion more than a year ago to complain to the defender of the condition of the house, and the defender pretended to the said deceased and the pursuer that he had made the drains good and sufficient, and pursuer was thereby induced to remain in possession." (Rev. cond. 5) "As the disagreeable smells still continued, and defender having refused, or at least failed, to get the same properly looked after and attended to, the pursuer, in the month of September 1887, lodged a complaint with the sanitary authorities in Rothesay, and the complaint was intimated to defender. Pursuer believes and avers that defender paid no, or at least insufficient, attention to these complaints,—suggestions of the authorities, and of other tradesmen, as to what was necessary to put said drains in proper condition, having been altogether disregarded." (Rev. cond. 6) "Through the effects of the insanitary condition of said house the pursuer and family suffered in health, and her three children became ill of diphtheria, whereof two of them, a daughter seven years of age, and a son aged eleven months, died, the latter on the 8th, and the former on the 10th day of January 1888. The pursuer specially took the house in question for the purpose of adding to her own income by letting out the same with attendance; but some of the families to whom pursuer had let her apartments for the summer months of 1887 had to leave the house. The pursuer has also been deprived of the use of the house, and has been under the necessity of removing from it. This was all directly caused by and attributable to the insanitary state of said house." (Rev. cond. 8) "From the effects of the insanitary condition of said house as before mentioned the pursuer has suffered loss and damage in doctor's bills, medicines, want of boarders, and expenses of removing, &c., and solatium for the loss of her two children, to the extent of at least £1000."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender not having fulfilled the terms of said let, and thereby committed a breach of contract, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved, with costs. (2) The pursuer, by defender's breach of duty and negligence in failing to have and keep said house in a sanitary condition, having suffered loss and damage to the amount sued for, decree ought to be granted as craved, with interest and expenses. (3) The deaths of the pursuer's children and the losses mentioned on record having been caused by the fault of the defender, all as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to solatium and reparation, and to decree as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(2) Defender not being responsible for the alleged loss and damage and expenses and solatium, or any of these, and these not being due in any part to the condition of his said house, or to his fault, he is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

On 3d May the Sheriff-substitute (Orr) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

The pursuer proposed the issue quoted below.*

The defender objected that the action was irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer did not sufficiently set forth the character of the alleged defects in the sanitary arrangements of the house, or the nature and results of the alleged complaints to the local authority, and further argued that a landlord was not responsible for the death of his tenants through defective drainage, at least in the circumstances averred by the pursuer. It was her duty to have left the house and sued for damages if she thought its sanitary arrangements were defective; if she chose to stay on, knowing the risk, it was no part of her landlord's duty to insure her or her family against the consequences.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—The record was sufficiently specific to entitle the pursuer to an issue. The pursuer had been induced to remain in the house through the representations of the defender that the defects would be cured. He was therefore responsible for the death of the children, and liable to the pursuer in solatium in consequence.

* "Whether the defender, in breach or wrongful neglect of his obligations as landlord of a house in Demerara Place, 32 Ardbeg Road, Rothesay, for the year from Whitsunday 1887 to Whitsunday 1888, failed to keep the sanitary arrangements and drains of said house in proper order and repair, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £1000."

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the statements of the pursuer on this record are not relevant. I think that no inquiry should be allowed, and that the defender should be assoilzied.

The substance of the case is this,—The pursuer is the widow of the tenant of the house belonging to the defender to which the complaint applies. The house had been held by the pursuer and her husband from year to year since 1883, and her statement is that in August 1887 the drains of the house went wrong, and "that the pursuer and her family experienced most disagreeable smells in the house," and then the complaint ends with the statement that two of her children have died of diphtheria, and a demand for £1000 as damages for her losses.

I am of opinion that this statement is entirely and absolutely defective. It is not said in what respect the drains were defective, nor indeed that any fault in them produced the disagreeable odours and the other results complained of. It is said that a complaint was made to the local authority, but it is not said what the local authority did, or whether they thought it necessary to do anything in answer to this complaint, and it is assumed because these children died of diphtheria that their death was caused by defects in the drainage. The whole complaint is plainly defective as ground on which to claim damage, and the last item of damage, the death of the children through the alleged defective sanitary arrangements, clearly cannot be allowed to go to proof.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I confess that from the first I have thought that this record was entirely defective in its statements, and proceeded on a radically erroneous idea. The house here is a small flat of the value, we were told, of £300, and the tenant of this flat is holding over the head of her landlord an action of damages for £1000—more than three times the fee-simple value of the property. She says that there was a bad smell in the house, and that something was wrong with the drains. She goes to complain to the landlord, and in the meanwhile two of the children die of diphtheria. She then brings this action against the landlord, apparently on the principle that a landlord insures the lives of his tenants and their whole family against the evil consequences of continuing to live in the house after they believe it to be in an insanitary condition. I know of no principle for such proceeding, nor of any precedent, and I am not inclined to make a precedent. I am clearly of opinion that neither ex contractu, nor ex delicto, nor quasi ex delicto, nor on any other ground, can this action be sustained.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am also of opinion that this action is not relevant.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, sustain the same: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Sustain the defences: Assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action: Find the defender entitled to expenses in the inferior Court, and in this Court," &c.

Expenses—Process—Interlocutor.—An interlocutor awarding expenses without qualification gives expenses as between party and party, and after the Court has pronounced such an interlocutor it is too late to move for expenses as between agent and client.

2D DIVISION.
I.

IN an action of multiplepoinding, exoneration, and discharge, brought by the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Mr Joseph Fletcher of Kelton House, Dumfriesshire, the Court, on a reclaiming note from the judgment of Lord M'Laren, pronounced, on 9th March 1888, an interlocutor disposing of the questions raised on the construction of Mr Fletcher's trust-settlement, and containing this finding of expenses—" Find all parties entitled to expenses out of the trust-estate; allow the accounts thereof to be given in, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report."

On 5th July 1888 the Auditor issued this interim report—" With the view of carrying out the remit contained in the interlocutor of Court of 9th March last, the Auditor has examined the accounts of expenses incurred by the parties in this case, and met the agents and received explanations from them, but before reporting he humbly requests the direction of the Court as to the principle of taxation. Reference is made to the subjoined note." *

At the hearing on the report Mr John Fletcher, one of the claimants (with whom, on this point, Mrs Fletcher, the widow of the truster, concurred), argued;—The intention of the Court when they decided the case was to give expenses as between agent and client. In any event, it was equitable that that should be done, and it was still within the power of the Court so to direct.

The trustees (acting in the interest of the children, nati et nascituri, of Mr John Fletcher) objected that the interlocutor could not be construed to mean an award of expenses as between agent and client, and that it was final.

LORD YOUNG.—I have no doubt about the matter; we have determined the matter by our interlocutor. The question whether a party should have expenses

* " NOTE.—At the meeting held this day for audit of the accounts it was maintained by the agent for Mr John Fletcher and others that the intention of the Court was that I should tax them as between agent and client. The finding for expenses is in these terms—' Find all parties entitled to expenses out of the trust-estate; allow accounts thereof to be given in, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report.' An examination of the record and of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary and shorthand notes of the advising in the Inner-House leads me to think that it may have been the intention of the Court to give the parties their expenses as between agent and client, but to prevent mistake on my part, and trouble to the Court and parties, I think it well to ask the Court to favour me with a direction on the subject. At the close of the advising counsel for the claimants said—' Your Lordships will allow the expenses of the parties to come out of the trust-estate'; and Lord Rutherfurd Clark (who had delivered the judgment of the Court) replied—' I think that is most reasonable. You can arrange what interlocutor should be pronounced giving effect to these views.' " in the ordinary way as between party and party, or should have expenses as between agent and client, is a question for the determination of the Court at the time the case is decided. In the one case the Court simply allows expenses; in the other case the interlocutor expressly bears that expenses are to be taxed as between agent and client. Here our interlocutor does not expressly bear that expenses are to be taxed as between agent and client. We are really asked therefore to alter our interlocutor, and I am not inclined to do that.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I entirely agree. It never occurred to me that in pronouncing our interlocutor as we did we were allowing expenses as between agent and client.

Aliment—Liability to support wife's mother—Married Women's Property Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 29), sec. 4.—Held that a man who was married subsequent to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, and who was not lucratus by the marriage, was not liable to aliment his wife's mother, in respect that the wife's obligation to aliment her mother was a subsisting obligation at the date of the marriage, and was an antenuptial debt in the sense of the Act.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Aberdeenshire.
M.

Mrs Ann M'Allan raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire against William Alexander, a railway servant, her son-in-law, for payment of two shillings per week as aliment, she being, as she alleged, in indigent circumstances.

The defender was married to the pursuer's daughter in December 1882. It was admitted by the pursuer that the defender was not lucratus by his marriage. He had a wife and three children to support.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender having been married to the pursuer's daughter subsequent to the passing of the Married Women's Property Acts of 1877 and 1881, and in respect he was not lucratus by the marriage, he is not bound to aliment his mother-in-law, and he should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, with expenses.*

The Sheriff-substitute (W. A. Brown) sustained the defender's first plea in law, and assoilzied the defender.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) adhered.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

indigent, was not a "debt" in the sense of the Act of 1877. It was an obediential obligation, which did not arise till the mother became indigent. The Act contemplated that the husband might receive "property" by the marriage, to the extent of which he might be liable for his wife's "debts." It did not use the expressions "rights" and "obligations," but "property" and "debts." That shewed that the meaning was contract debt, not debt in a wider meaning in which it would include an obligation ex debito naturali. That a husband was liable at common law to support his wife's indigent parent appeared from the case of Reid v. Moir,[1] and that of Foulis.[2]

The respondent was not called on.

Lord President.—I entirely agree with the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute. I think the clause of the statute is explicit and conclusive. By the judgments of the Court in the cases of Reid v. Moir and Foulis it was held that the husband of a woman is liable to support her indigent parent; he becomes liable to do so by reason of being the woman's husband, and therefore liable for her debts of all kinds without exception. Among these the obligation to support her parents is one. No doubt it is not an obligation of contract but a natural obligation, but it is not the less on that account an antenuptial debt of the wife. It existed though it was not prestable. Though circumstances had not occurred to make it necessary for the woman to perform the obligation, it was an obligation all the same. It is like the case put by one of your Lordships during the debate—that of a woman being a cautioner, but not being distressed for payment of the debt till after her marriage.

In another case decided not many years ago,—I mean that of Wishart, 8 R. 74,—we decided that where a man held shares in a joint stock company, but died before calls were made upon the shares, he was liable through his executors to pay these calls when the time arrived at which calls were payable. The obligation was undertaken when he took the shares, although it was not prestable until a future time. The clause of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, which applies to the case, is this,—"In any marriage which takes place after the commencement of this Act the liability of the husband for the antenuptial debts of his wife shall be limited to the value of any property which he shall have received from, through, or in right of his wife at, or before, or subsequent to the marriage . . ." For the reasons I have stated I think that this was clearly an antenuptial debt, and it being admitted that the defender got nothing by the marriage, in any way, either at the time of it or subsequently, I think the judgment must be affirmed.

Lord Shand.—I am of the same opinion. If the terms used in the statute had been "obligations" instead of "debts" there could have been no question, but it appears to me that if there exists an obligation at the time of the marriage either from contract or delict, and a debt arises afterwards in consequence of that obligation, that is truly a debt in the sense of the statute. I therefore concur in thinking that this liability is practically a debt at the date of the marriage, and as it appears that this husband did not get estate to meet that debt through the marriage, there is, in my opinion, no liability upon him for the debt now sued for.

Lord Adam.—I think the obligation of a daughter to support her indigent mother is an obligation existing before the marriage, and I do not think it is of the least consequence upon what ground that obligation is founded, whether upon contract or otherwise, and as the husband is in this case not lucratus by the marriage he is not, in my opinion, liable for this antenuptial debt of his wife.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Malice—Words prima facie slanderous spoken by member of public body pertinently to subject before it.—At a meeting of police commissioners of a burgh a member, who had heard complaints regarding the conduct of a sheriff-officer who had charge of collecting arrears of water-rates, said in supporting a motion which he made as to employing a different system for the collection of police-rates,—"What could be more repulsive than to demand rates of a dying woman. . . . . Sheriff-officers are not always worshippers of the sober deity." On another member expressing his opinion that the sheriff-officer was a competent man, he said,—"A man who is drunk cannot be competent. . . . I would rather let loose a wild beast upon the community than a drunk man."

In an action of damages against him by the sheriff-officer for slander the Court found that the defender used the language complained of in the course of his duty as a member of the police commission, and that it was not proved that he wittingly spoke falsely or that he was actuated by malice; and held that he was privileged in expressing himself as he did, in respect that he was versans in officio, and that he was entitled to absolvitor.

2d Division.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.
I.

John Shaw, sheriff-officer, Ayr, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire against Arthur Morgan, bookseller there, to recover damages in respect of alleged slander by him.

The pursuer had been appointed collector of water-rates in the burgh in December 1886, and a summary warrant against ratepayers in arrear had been handed to him that he might collect the arrears. The defender was a town-councillor and police commissioner of Ayr and a member of a committee of council usually known as the Arrears of Rates Committee.

At a meeting of Ayr Police Commissioners in the Council Chambers on 14th February 1887 the defender made the following motion with reference to the police assessments payable on 14th February 1887:—"In the middle of March, to appoint a collector to call for all unpaid rates, without costs, and that this collector be authorised to receive instalments from those out of employment, and that all rates unpaid at the end of the statutory period be recovered according to law." In the course of a speech in support of the motion, in which he said it was undesirable to employ a sheriff-officer if they could get a collector to do the work satisfactorily, the defender used the following expressions:—"What could be more repulsive than to demand rates of a dying woman. . . . Sheriff-officers were not always worshippers of the sober deity." Provost Kilpatrick, who presided at the meeting, interrupting, said,—"For myself, I think that Shaw is quite a competent man." The defender replied,—"A man who is drunk cannot be competent, and Bailie Shankland knows that. I would rather let loose a wild beast upon the community than a drunk man."

Shaw v. Morgan.

The pursuer stated that these words were intended to apply to him, and were so understood by those who heard and read them, and that the defender's object was "to represent the pursuer as inhuman, drunk on duty, and an incompetent and unworthy man to act as collector, and thereby to obtain the dismissal of the pursuer, or to prevent the further employment of the pursuer in the collection of burgh rates. . . . . . The said statements made by the defender were not pertinent to the subject-matter then before the police commissioners, which was a motion by the defender himself relative to the collection of police-rates, and were made ultroneously by the defender."

The pursuer further stated,—"The defender took advantage of his public position to comment unfairly, falsely, maliciously, calumniously, and without probable cause, upon the pursuer's conduct at the said meeting of police commissioners, without notice to the pursuer, and where the pursuer had no privilege of reply, to the prejudice of the pursuer, and to his loss, injury, and damage to his feelings, character, reputation, and business." (Cond. 17) "The said false and calumnious statements by the defender against the pursuer . . . were without probable cause, and, if not made maliciously, were made recklessly, culpably, and calumniously, without due inquiry into the whole facts and circumstances connected with the pursuer's proceedings and conduct as collector."

The defender denied these averments. He stated that the pursuer was paid by a commission on the sum collected, with a higher commission upon arrears; and that, with a view to the recovery of the police-rates payable on 14th February 1887, he (the defender) had at a regular meeting of the police commission in February 1887, after due notice, proposed a motion to the effect that a different system for collecting rates should be adopted. He further stated that in speaking to that motion he had said,—"What could be more repulsive than to demand rates of a dying woman, and to drag to a police-office on a charge of theft a poor creature who held on by a chair which was being removed. Sheriff-officers, too, were not always worshippers of the sober deity. What a contrast to the care that was taken in looking after lame sheep and broken-shouldered horses, and punishing those who abused the dumb animals. Their taxes were heavy, but he believed the people of Ayr would bear a halfpenny more rather than expose their poor fellow-townsmen to the relentless fury of a summary distraining warrant." He further stated that the pursuer's name had been introduced into the discussion by one of the magistrates, Bailie Shankland, who said that in appointing Mr Shaw to collect the arrears of water-rates they thought they were making as good an appointment as they could; that in the subsequent discussion the pursuer's name was referred to, and his conduct as collector of water-rates remarked upon, and pertinently used as an argument against the defender's motion, and that he (defender) in his reply was again referring to recovery of rates by poinding by a sheriff-officer, and had complained of it as being a measure like putting a pistol to a man's head, when the provost interrupting him said,—"For myself I think that Shaw is quite a competent man," whereupon he, defender, proceeding with his reply, said,—"A man that is drunk cannot be competent, and Baillie Shankland knows that. I would rather let loose a wild beast upon the community than a drunk man." He admitted that he intended to convey the meaning that the pursuer was sometimes drunk, but averred that his statements were true in fact, and privileged as being made in the exercise of his public duty as a member of the police commission.

He set forth a number of occasions upon which he averred the pursuer had been drunk, or behaved in a drunken manner when engaged in his duty of collecting arrears of water-rates.

Shaw v. Morgan.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The said false and calumnious statements being made by the defender in reference to the pursuer, and meant by the defender to apply to the pursuer, as libelled, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage to his feelings, character, reputation, and business, the pursuer is entitled to solatium and damages therefor. (3) The defender's statements at the meeting of police commissioners, not having been pertinent to the subject-matter before the meeting at the time, were not privileged. (4) The statements complained of in the condescendence were made by the defender maliciously, and without probable cause, to the loss, injury, and damage to the feelings, character, reputation, and business of the pursuer, for which the pursuer is entitled to solatium and damages.

The defender pleaded;—(4) The statements "having been made by the defender in his capacity of a Police Commissioner of the burgh of Ayr, at and to a regular meeting of the Town-Council or Police Commission of Ayr, and having been made by the defender in bona fides, and with probable cause, he is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action in respect of such statements, with expenses." (8) The whole statements made by the defender being true in fact, or warranted by the pursuer's acts and behaviour, the defender is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The defender's allegations as to the pursuer being drunk when engaged in his duty, and as to his harshness in the discharge of it, were not proved. It was proved, however, that accusations to that effect had been made to the defender by various persons in Ayr.

The acting Sheriff-substitute (Watson) found in law that in making the accusations against the pursuer the defender was not in the circumstances protected by privilege; in fact that the defender had failed to prove that his accusations were well founded; therefore found in law that the accusations being false and calumnious the defender was liable in damages, and assessed the damages at £10.

On appeal the Sheriff (Brand) adhered.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The occasion was privileged. It was a meeting of a public municipal body at which the defender was entitled, and indeed bound, to lay before the meeting his views, and the reasons for them. No doubt he was not entitled to say what was not pertinent to the issue. But in discussing whether legal distress at the hands of a sheriff-officer was a judicious way of collecting the police-rates, it was pertinent to argue that it had been found a bad and harsh way of collecting water-rates. Besides, the strongest language applied by the pursuer was applied to the system, and not to the pursuer. It was the system he described, for example, as inhuman. A town-councillor to whom allegations were made by his constituents that a public servant was drunk on duty, and discharged his duty harshly, was well entitled to refer to these charges at a meeting of council in which he was advocating a new system of discharging a similar duty. The case of Craig v. Jex Blake[1] did not apply, because the body at the meeting of which the words there complained of were used was (though a statutory body of contributors to a charity) not in the same position as a town-council, and because the reference to an individual was in this case pertinent to the matter in hand, whereas in that case it was held to have been impertinent to the subject to discuss the character and actions of an individual.

Morgan.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender had used the discussion on another subject to make an attack on the character of the pursuer. He could have gone to the Arrears Committee, placed his complaint and the charges he had heard before them, and asked for inquiry. That would have been a case of privilege. But he had preferred, without personal inquiry, to publish at a public meeting of a public body these allegations, which it was not now said could be substantiated. He had no privilege in doing that. Where in discussing any subject it was not necessary for the performance of the duty of discussing it to single out an individual, then that individual had a right of action if singled out and slandered.[1] That was established, not by the case of Jex Blake alone, but by earlier cases.[2] If, then, it was impertinent to the business of the meeting, which was the mode of future collection of police-rates, to utter calumnies against the pursuer, the collector of water-rates, the pursuer must prevail. If malice needed to be proved, the defender, by giving utterance publicly without due inquiry to slanders reported to him by others whom he did not name, had acted so recklessly that the law would imply malice. The proof shewed that he had misrepresented even what he had been told, so far as the charges he professed to have received from others could be traced. His failure to go first of all to the Arrears Committee and make his charges there was the best possible evidence of legal malice.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The only question on which I mean to say anything in this case is the question of privilege, for I think the Sheriffs are right in holding that the words are calumnious, and also in holding that the plea of veritas has not been established. There remains then only the defence of privilege. On it I shall make a few observations. I cannot help regretting that such a case should be in Court. The defender is a town-councillor of Ayr, and the pursuer a sheriff-officer there. It appears that in the town-council a discussion took place as to the mode of collecting the police and other rates within the burgh. The pursuer was the person who had been appointed to collect water-rates which were in arrear. Some feeling had arisen in the burgh that these rates were oppressively collected, and the discussion took place to which I have alluded. The defender moved that a man not a sheriff-officer be appointed as collector of arrears of police-rates. Apparently that was objected to by the provost, and in the course of the discussion observations were made with regard to the pursuer. It appears that Bailie Shankland, who was convener of the Committee on arrears of water-rates, said that he was not aware of anything that had taken place in the collection that could be considered in the least repugnant to the feelings of the members of council, and that in appointing the pursuer to collect the arrears he thought they had made as suitable an appointment as they could. Then the provost interposed, and said,—"For myself, I consider that Shaw is quite a competent man," and the defender proceeded to reply, in these words,—"A man that is drunk cannot be competent, and Bailie Shankland knows that. I would rather let loose a wild beast on the community than a drunk man." Now, unquestionably, this language was not well chosen, and it is not wonderful that the pursuer felt himself injured by the defender's remarks. For it is quite certain that this language was intended to apply to him. But the defender pleads that the occasion was privileged, and I am of opinion that in that plea he is right, that the occasion was a privileged occasion, and that the judgment of the Sheriff is in that respect not sound. I think the general rule applicable to the case is that if in the conduct of public business any member of a public body which is considering and deliberating for the public benefit thinks right in the public interest to make use of expressions which are pertinent to the matter in hand, though they may bear hardly on individuals, that occasion is nevertheless privileged, unless malice be averred and proved. It is an important, and I think salutary principle, that in such a case malice must be proved, and if it can be shewn that a member of a public body has been guilty of abusing his position for the purpose of calumniating his neighbour, then that is another case, privilege is avoided, and the speaker will be responsible. But I think that is not the case here. I think a town-council is a typical instance of a public body, the members of which enjoy a privilege in the language they use in dealing with the public affairs of the burgh. Such a body, as part of the municipal government of the county, is one of importance, and statements made in it are of importance and weight, and the principle which has been extended to such bodies as kirk-sessions, a senatus academicus of a university, and the like, will apply even more strongly to the town-council of a burgh. Language used in it in the course of the conduct of public business will enjoy a privilege.

Reference has been made both by the Sheriffs and at the debate to the case of Craig v. Jex Blake. But I think that case affords a contrast rather than an analogy to the case before us. It was decided upon this principle, that there may be privilege in regard to words spoken with regard to the subject-matter which is under deliberation, but that that privilege shall not protect the speaker if he travel beyond that subject to refer to and reflect upon an individual. The same principle has received effect in other cases than that. It was there applied to a case where the body deliberating was certainly of less importance than a town-council. It was a body the meetings of which were substantially private—a charitable body. It was a meeting of contributors to the Edinburgh Infirmary, and the matter under discussion was how far women should be admitted to the Infirmary to practise their studies with a view to becoming medical practitioners. In the course of the meeting a lady made some observations with regard to a riot said to have been taken part in by students, and alluded to one of them by name in pretty strong language. Now, that was an entirely different case. It presented the element of criticism of an individual which was not pertinent to the subject-matter at issue. I think, therefore, that the distinction between that case and the present is manifest.

On the whole matter I think that this town-council was a privileged body, and that the words complained of were used in the ordinary course of municipal business, and were privileged, and that malice has not been established. I am therefore for altering the judgment, and for holding that the defender should be assoilzied.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The word "privilege," as has been often remarked, is an unfortunate and misleading word. But the idea it is meant to express is simple, and may be easily stated. The word "privilege" is misleading, because it is apt to convey to the uninstructed mind the idea that there may be circumstances in which slander is privileged. That is not so.

The doctrine stands on the proposition that there is no such thing as slander without malice. Slander is a defamatory statement maliciously made to the injury of another. If the statement, however defamatory, is not malicious, it is not slander. That law is stated both in the English text-books and by our own Judges. But when a man says or writes anything defamatory of another, he is assumed to do so maliciously. The law presumes malice from the defamatory character of the statement unless the occasion on which it is made is what is termed a privileged occasion, so that the presumption of malice is displaced by the occasion. If a man in mere gossip utter a slander, the law assumes that he did so maliciously, and he must answer accordingly far it. Malice is imputed to him without any evidence but the making of the statement, and the untruth of the statement, it being defamatory, will in like manner be presumed unless he proves its truth. But if the occasion be privileged, if the statement be made in the discharge of a duty or in the reasonable attention to a man's own business and affairs, which gives him legitimate cause to write or speak of his neighbour, the occasion displaces the presumption of malice and the presumption of falsehood, and he is only answerable if malice be shewn to have existed in fact, and if the statement be untrue. Now, what was the occasion here?—a meeting of town-council, at which a member made a motion—whether a sensible one or not is not for me to judge—but a perfectly legitimate motion. The substance of it was to put the collection of arrears of police-rates in the hands, not of a sheriff-officer for collection under a distress warrant, but of a collector to be appointed, and to be paid by salary or percentage on what he collected. In supporting the motion he made a speech pressing it upon the favourable consideration of the body whom he was addressing, and illustrated the importance of the subject and the advantages of the course his motion recommended by the evil of the other system according to what he observed, or what he heard, or, it may be, even by fanciful cases just by way of illustration. Well, I daresay the speech was not all relevant to the matter in hand. That may be said of many speeches we are accustomed to hear. But it was a speech pertinent to the matter in hand, and the speaker was, according to his lights and abilities, speaking to that and pressing his views upon the favourable attention of his audience, and answering, it may be, anticipated objections. Well, if a member of a town-council in a meeting of council or of committee for a special purpose addresses the meeting in the discharge of his public duty as a member, I think he is prima facie privileged, and what he said on the matter being pertinent in the general and comprehensive sense I have explained, then it should not be assumed that he was actuated by malice and speaking untruthfully merely because he said something defamatory of another. What the defender said I take to be defamatory. It imputes reckless conduct in executing a warrant, and also intoxication. But the suggestion was made in the course of supporting what I assume to be a very legitimate motion, and one of great importance in his view, that rather than put summary warrants into the hands of a sheriff-officer, who might be very oppressive to poor people who were in arrears with their rates, it would be more humane to those in arrears, and likely on the whole to be more profitable too, if a collector were appointed at a percentage as he proposed. I cannot say that the occasion was such that I must assume that the defender was actuated by malice towards the pursuer, and that there was no ground for the statement, merely because the defender made it. It might be shewn that he made it through malice, and an important step to that consisted in shewing that it was not true, and that the defender had no reasonable ground for believing it to be so. If a man makes a defamatory statement which is untrue in fact, and does not shew that he had any reasonable ground for making it, that is some evidence that he was actuated by malice, and that being affirmed, he will be held guilty of an actionable wrong. But on the evidence I think the occasion was privileged, and that the defender is not proved to have acted maliciously. I do not hold it to be established by any means that the pursuer acted oppressively, or was in the habit of getting tipsy, but I think the defender at the time he used that language was entitled to use it, unless it appears that he did so maliciously, and there is abundant evidence to shew that it was a matter of common rumour that the pursuer acted oppressively, and sometimes took too much drink, and I do not think that the defender's rhetorical reference to the rumour can found the action without proof of ill-will, or that the statement was such that it must be characterised as malicious, proceeding from malus animus.

These are my grounds of judgment. The case of Craig v. Jex Blake was referred to. I think this case is distinguishable from it. There was not there such a body as a town-council, which is a constitutional body. It was a meeting of subscribers to the Royal Infirmary. No doubt that is a statutory body; but I think the occasion was one different from a meeting of a town-council, which is a constitutional body with lawful authority in the country, and different from a body of subscribers, even although under a private Act of Parliament. I am not desirous to dwell upon the case of Jex Blake, but I may say, and I do so without hesitation, that it requires reconsideration. There has been considerable variety of decision in this branch of the law, and if we go back a few years before that case, I think we find that the tendency was to abolish the defence of privilege altogether, unless the man was speaking in the necessary discharge of a duty incumbent on him, and would be failing in his duty if he did not make it. I think there had been an advance before 1871, when the Jex Blake case was decided, and so also since 1871, in the direction I have indicated. I should have thought—I confess it is my opinion now—that the occasion in that case was privileged, and that when the lady was speaking of a professor's assistant as having taken part in a students' riot, and of having done so in such a way that the best apology for him must be that he was tipsy, the occasion was privileged. And the mere fact of imputing intoxication and the taking part in a students' riot to the assistant to one of the professors was not sufficient to infer malice. I think it was prima facie a kind of statement which did not imply malice. I was counsel in the case on the side which was unsuccessful, and may therefore probably be apt to take a stronger view against the judgment than I might otherwise have done.

But there was another fact in that case which appears on the face of the report. The pursuer was called as a witness for the defender and asked by her counsel this question,—Did you take any part in the riot? His own counsel objected, and the question was disallowed. It is true there was no issue of veritas, but if there is anything established in this class of cases, it is that without an issue of veritas the defender may ask the pursuer about his own conduct in the affair, and take his own account of it in mitigation of his claim of damages for the injury which he alleges that he has sustained. In my judgment then that case requires reconsideration. At all events, I am not now, seventeen years afterwards, going to apply it to a member of a town-council making a speech in the council on the occasion of making a legitimate motion. I hold that the defender made the statement while in the discharge of his duty as a town-councillor, that it was pertinent to the subject on which he was speaking, and that falsehood and malice are not proved.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I have great difficulty in distinguishing between this case and that of Craig v. Jex Blake. As to that case, I wish to say that I see nothing against the judgment that was there pronounced. But as your Lordships are both of opinion that a distinction may be drawn, I accept it and agree.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I intended to have said that I think the difference between this case and that of Jex Blake is that here the individual conduct of the pursuer was the question in hand, while in that case the conduct of an individual was not. I think that what we are doing now is what was done in the case of Auld v. Shairp in 1874.[1]

Lord Craighill was absent.

> This interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, find in fact that on the occasion libelled the defender used the language complained of by the pursuer; that he did so in course of his duty as a member of a committee of the town-council; and that it is not proved that he wittingly spoke falsely, or that he was actuated by malice: Find in law that he was privileged in expressing himself as he did, in respect that he was versans in officio: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action: Find him entitled to expenses in the inferior Courts, and in this Court: Remit," &c.

Smiles v. Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co. Limited.
1st Division.
M.

The Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company, Limited, was formed in 1880, with a registered office in Edinburgh, for the objects, as set forth in the memorandum of association, of, inter alia, taking over the business of a firm of woolbrokers in Melbourne, and selling wool and other produce on commission, or making shipments of the same for sale on commission, of purchasing or acquiring any real or personal property, and of borrowing money and negotiating loans upon the security of any description of property, including stock and stations and liens on wool, &c.

In each year after its formation, including 1885-86, the company returned its profits and gains, and was assessed and paid duty thereon in terms of the first case of schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.

In August 1886 an additional assessment of £669, 6s. 8d. was made by the surveyor of taxes upon the sum of £20,080, being the difference between the sum on which the company was assessed for the year 1885-86, in terms of the first case, and the amount of the interest on the company's colonial securities for the year of assessment under the fourth case of schedule D, and of the company's profits and gains from transactions in the nature of trade chargeable under the first case of schedule D.

The company appealed to the Commissioners for General Purposes for the county of Edinburgh, who sustained the appeal and discharged the additional assessment, being of opinion that the profits of the company's business were chargeable with income-tax under the rules applicable to the first case of schedule D only.

The surveyor required a case to be stated for the opinion of the Court in which the question of law, as amended after a remit by the Court for that purpose, was,—"(1) Whether the company ought to be assessed to income-tax only in respect of its whole profits and gains, including the interest received from its investments in foreign and colonial securities, according to the rule contained in the first case of schedule D, section 100, 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, or whether the company is chargeable for its income arising from interest on its foreign and colonial securities under the rule contained in the fourth case of schedule D, and for its profits and gains from transactions in the nature of trade under the first case of schedule D of the said Act?" There were other questions which, in view of the decision of the Court, it is unnecessary to set forth.

Case.—Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade not contained in any other schedule of this Act.

"Rule First.—The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years, ending on such day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern shall have been usually made up, or on the fifth day of April preceding the year of assessment, and shall be assessed, charged, and paid, without other deduction than is hereinafter allowed." The remainder of the rule related to trades, manufactures, adventures, or concerns, set up and commenced within the said period of three years, or within the year of assessment.

"Fourth Case.—The duty to be charged in respect of interest arising from securities in the British Plantations in America, or in any other of Her Majesty's Dominions out of the United Kingdom and foreign securities, except such annuities, dividends and shares as are directed to be charged under schedule C of this Act.

"Rule.—The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums (so far as the same can be computed) which have been or will be received in the United Kingdom, in the current year, without any deduction or abatement."

Smiles v. Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co. Limited.

From the case it appeared, inter alia, that the amount of the company's transactions in the nature of trade were not separately distinguished in the company's accounts from the amount of the interest on their colonial securities. It further bore:—"9. The advances or loans made by the company are on securities almost without exception postponed to fixed loans by third parties upon the properties of their customers, and are in part secured by their second mortgages over real property in the colony, and in part by liens or charges upon stock, wool, and other produce. Another part of the company's funds is lent on the security of shipments of wool and other produce, some of which may be in warehouse in Australia, some in course of transit to this country, and some in warehouse in London. The advances, with one or two trifling exceptions, are not of fixed amount, but are of the nature of banker's advances or loans, the amounts of which fluctuate from time to time, according as produce is realised, or other payments are made. The 'advances secured upon mortgages, stock, and liens over wool and other produce' are stated in the balance-sheet of the company, for the year ended 30th September 1885, to amount to the sum of

and the 'advances on shipments of wool and other produce and sundry open accounts outstanding,' to amount to the sum of	483,209	5	0
Total,	£1,357,390	17	0

. . . . 11. Before the commissioners it was maintained, on behalf of the company, that the company was 'an adventure or concern in the nature of trade,' and that, for the purposes of assessment to income-tax, the profits of the company for the year of assessment should be estimated according to the rule contained in the first case above quoted on the average of the three preceding years, in the same manner as it had been hitherto assessed; and that the company's profits should not be charged part under one rule and part under another. It was further maintained that under the fourth case of schedule D of the Act no allowance or deduction is made for the following contingencies, to all of which it is admitted the company is liable, and which would fall to be allowed as deductions in conformity with rule 3 of the first case, viz.:—(1) For bad debts. (2) For rent of premises in which their trade of woolbrokers is carried on. (3) For insurance. (4) For possible losses at sea, not covered by insurance. (5) For cablegrams, which, in a business of this description, forms a serious element of expenditure. (6) For depreciation in warehousing plant. (7) For salaries to servants conducting the warehousing business; and (8) For claims in respect of guarantees which the company gives.

"12. It was likewise maintained that the amount of profit appearing in the balance-sheet for the year ending 30th September 1885 includes interest on real and personal securities in the colony of the description mentioned under head 9, on advances on wool and other produce in course of transit to this country, profits on guarantees granted by the company, commission on sales, warehouse rents, interest on moneys in bank in this country, interests on consols, and trade profits generally, that many of these items are incapable of exact segregation, the company's lending business being almost wholly regarded as a feeder to their commission business, making it impossible to say how much of the profit is derived from interest on advances and how much from commission upon the produce dealt with, and that the nature of these securities fluctuates from day to day and from hour to hour. . . . 13. It was likewise maintained, that the company was different in its constitution from either the Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Company of New Mexico, Limited (14 R. 98), or the Northern Investment Company of New Zealand, Limited (14 R. 734), inasmuch as it is not merely an investment company, but a material part of its business is the warehousing, and the purchase and sale on commission, of wool and other produce and property, both in this country and in Australia, which is entirely in the nature of trade. 14. It was further maintained for the company, that even although case 4, schedule D, did apply, the assessment thereunder must be subject to abatement to the extent to which the interest accrued in the colony was divided among shareholders there. 15. It was further maintained for the company that the surveyor, having adopted the three years' average with this company, was not at liberty to alter it so as to prejudice the company assessed. . . . 17. The surveyor, on the other hand, maintained, on behalf of the Crown, that the interest accruing to the company on their mortgage loans and advances in the colony was profit of the nature described or comprised in the third paragraph, schedule D, section 2, of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34, viz.—'for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, and other annual profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules contained in this Act,' and that the company was liable to be assessed on the total amount of the interest which had been or would be received in the United Kingdom in the year of assessment, according to the rule contained in the fourth case of schedule D, section 100, of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35. 18. The surveyor further contended that a species of profit or gain appropriately set forth in the statute by its true specific denomination as chargeable in a particular way, under a particular rule, could not properly be classed under another and more general designation, in order to bring it under the operation of another rule regulating the assessment of a different description of profit. 19. In support of his contention, the surveyor referred to the decisions of the Court in the cases of the Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Company of New Mexico, Limited (14 R. p. 98), and the Northern Investment Company of New Zealand, Limited (14 R. p. 734.)"

Argued for the Surveyor of Taxes;—To infer liability under the fourth case all that was required was to shew (1) that the interest to be assessed had been obtained from securities in the colonies; and (2) that it had been received in this country. If these two conditions were present—and they were in this case—it was immaterial whether the securities were real or personal, and whether the interest was of a fluctuating character or not.[1] There was no authority for the construction put by the company upon the words "interest arising from securities." The application of the fourth case was not prevented by the fact that the company had other profits chargeable to assessment under the first case, or that the company might be said to be a banking or trading concern. The majority of the many mortgage companies which now carried on business abroad had powers to act as agents for the investment of moneys, just as this company did. And none of them restricted themselves to pure mortgage loans. But further, it was not hujus loci to inquire into the nature of the loans in question, nor into the question whether the same rule would apply to the case of banks and insurance companies investing their funds abroad.

Smiles v. Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co. Limited.

Argued for the company;—I. The real interest involved in the question in the case was whether the company were to be assessed upon an average of three years' profits under the first case, or upon the amount of one year's interest, without any deductions under the fourth case. The New Mexico and Northern Investment Company's cases were distinguishable from the present, because they were investing companies only. They did not deal, as this company did, in ordinary mercantile securities, nor did they make advances of the nature of cash-credits on wool and such like produce, nor did they do commission-agent's and banker's business. Such transactions were not the kind of investments in securities which fell within the fourth case; nor was the interest or income derived from them periodically paid, as was also necessary under the fourth case. The interest was of a fluctuating nature, as stated in the case, and was like the discount on a bill. II. Besides, for the purposes of assessment the company must be treated as a unum quid. The Inland Revenue must assess it either under the first or the fourth case. But confessedly the company was to some extent a trading one, and fell to be assessed accordingly under the first case. It would be a great hardship if it were held that the Revenue might assess the income embraced in this case under the fourth case, in which event it would not be open to the company to deduct any losses they might have sustained upon their trading transactions which fell for assessment purposes under the first case.

At advising,—

Lord President.—The company called the Australasian Mortgage and Agency Company carries on a very extensive business in connection with the Australian Colonies, and that business is of a somewhat miscellaneous character. They are woolbrokers to begin with, and they both buy and sell wool, and, of course, like all other produce brokers, they advance money on the security of the goods in which they deal, and receive a commission for their agency. It appears to me that the sort of trade in which they are engaged is partly the trade of a broker and partly the trade of a banker. They do not call themselves bankers, but the description which is given in the case before us makes it pretty plain, I think, that they are at least as much bankers as brokers in so far as the nature of their business is concerned.

Now, the proposal on the part of the Surveyor of Income-Tax is to charge the profits of a part of their business under the fourth case of schedule D,—that is to say, he proposes to deal with that part of the profits of the business as being interest arising from securities in the colony, so far as that interest is received in this country. And the surveyor seeks to justify that proposal by a reference to the two cases which we formerly decided upon that fourth case of schedule D. But it appears to me that the present case is very clearly distinguishable from the former cases, and distinguishable in all its essential particulars. No doubt, in the two former cases the companies were trading companies, but in the first of the cases the trade consisted of one thing only, and in the later case it was really assumed that there also the trade was of one description only, although it appears that there were some trifling additional profits arising in some other way. But the trade in both cases consisted in this,—the company employed their capital, so far as paid up, and the money borrowed in this country, to make investments in foreign or colonial securities. In the case of the borrowed money they were enabled to borrow it in this country at a considerably lower rate of interest than they got for it after placing it in colonial investments; and therefore their profits consisted in the first place in getting a larger return per cent upon their paid-up capital, and also a very considerable gain as between the interest which they paid upon their debentures here and that which they received upon investments abroad. We held that although these were trading companies, and might have been assessed under the first case of schedule D upon profits of trade, they were equally within the meaning of the fourth case, because their profits consisted distinctly of interest upon foreign or colonial securities received in this country.

Now, in the present case, the business carried on by the company is of a very different description, and, in my opinion, it is quite unnecessary to go farther than the 9th article of this case to shew what is in the admitted state of the facts the real business carried on. "The advances or loans made by the company" (that article states) "are on securities almost without exception postponed to fixed loans by third parties upon the properties of their customers, and are in part secured by their second mortgages over real property in the colony, and in part by liens or charges upon stock, wool, and other produce. Another part of the company's funds is lent on the security of shipments of wool and other produce, some of which may be in warehouse in Australia, some in course of transit to this country, and some in warehouse in London." Now, as regards the second part or branch of the business, it is not said that it can be charged under the fourth case, and it is proposed to charge that under the first case. But we are chiefly concerned with what is stated in the first sentence of this article, that the advances or loans are made partly upon real property, and are partly secured "by liens or charges upon stock, wool, and other produce." But the statement does not stop there. "The advances"—this embraces the whole advances—"the advances, with one or two trifling exceptions, are not of fixed amount, but are of the nature of banker's advances or loans, the amounts of which fluctuate from time to time according as produce is realised or other payments are made."

Now, it will be observed that that statement is not confined to the advances upon shipments only, but applies to the whole advances, whether made upon real securities or by liens or charges upon stock, wool, and other produce. In short, it appears to me that the account between the company and its customers is just of the nature of a current account as between banker and customer, for the advances are made according to the amount of security held for the time. It may also be described as of the nature of a commission-agent's account. But it is the one or the other; and it seems to me to be not at all of the nature of investments of money. On the contrary, the advances are of the most irregular and fluctuating description,—just such advances as a commission-agent makes upon the security of the goods in his hands in this country, or that a banker makes according to the state of the securities which he holds for the time.

Now, the question is whether that is a case within the meaning of the fourth case in the Act; and I think it is not. I think this is proper trading and nothing else, and not investment of money upon securities. The result of holding it to be otherwise would be I think most unjust, and to such a company as this utterly disastrous. Supposing that they had a very large amount of advances upon such fluctuating securities as these, and that they are held to have received interests upon these in this country within the meaning of the fourth case, and that upon the other branch of their business they have sustained very heavy losses,—losses which it would require all the returns from these advances to compensate and wipe off, the result would be that instead of setting one part of the business against the other,—the profit upon these advances against the losses upon other transactions,—they would be compelled to pay income-tax upon that part which consists of advances upon securities of wool, and discount of bills, and everything of that kind, instead of being allowed to take the profit on the one part of their business and set it against the loss upon the other part.

It is not, to be sure, of much consequence how cruel may be the effect of a revenue statute, as we are not entitled to take that into account if the statute is perfectly clear. But it certainly helps one very much to the conclusion at which I have arrived when we see what an unjust and anomalous result might flow from sustaining this proposal upon the part of the surveyor of income-tax. I think the whole of this tax must be levied according to the first case of schedule D, and that it is impossible to distinguish one part of the business from another, and to hold that one part falls under the fourth case and the other part under the first.

The other queries of course we do not require to answer at all.

Lord Mure.—I agree with your Lordship that this case is quite distinct from that of the New Mexico Company which we had to deal with some time ago. It is plain from the articles which are quoted in the statement of the case that the objects of this company embraced very many kinds of trade. The 5th article of the case mentions the different kinds of business which the company was established to carry on as a trading company. It enumerates seventeen different objects; and it is stated at the end of the article that "the company carries on all the branches specified in the said objects." Now, that being its position, and reading statement 9 as to what actually takes place in regard to the particular matter here in question, and especially that passage of it which your Lordship has referred to, to the effect that the advances, with one or two trifling exceptions, are not of fixed amount, but are of the nature of banker's advances or loans, I can come to no other conclusion than that this is a case that ought to be dealt with under the first and not under the fourth case of schedule D.

Lord Shand.—I am of the same opinion, namely, that, as I understand it, the judgment of the Commissioners, which is practically here appealed from, should be affirmed. It appears to me, after a full argument on the effect of the previous cases, and on the provisions of the statute, that the fourth case in the statute is meant to cover the case in which money is invested upon "securities in the British Plantations in America, or in any other of Her Majesty's Dominions out of the United Kingdom,"—I say invested, meaning by that something quite distinct from the use of money in the ordinary trading transactions of a company. It appears to me that if we are dealing with a company making profits by the use of its capital in mercantile transactions, that should fall under the first case, but if a company which has a large rest or fund laid aside for the purpose of investment makes investments in foreign stock or other foreign securities, including securities over moveable property in the Colonies, that is a case in which the charge is to be made under the fourth case. And in so holding I do not think that we run counter in the least degree to anything that occurred either in the case of the Scottish Mortgage Company of New Mexico, or in the case of the Northern Investment Company of New Zealand. In both of these cases the Court went upon the view that, as matter of fact, the companies carried on as their sole business the business of investing their funds in foreign or colonial securities. They obtained their capital partly by subscription and partly by persons lending them large sums of money to increase the working capital. Having thus got the capital, the avowed business of these companies was to invest the money abroad for a return larger than can be got in this country, upon securities which were not of a fluctuating character, such as occur in a banker's business, but which were permanent, and intended to produce interest periodically and regularly,—securities which were to have a currency usually of a number of years. That was just the case of a company doing as matter of business what an individual investor might do with his own funds; and the view which the Court there sustained was that it made no difference whether it was an individual who was investing his money abroad or a company which was investing its capital abroad. The course followed was the same, viz., the investment of funds, and in such a case the fourth case of the statute applied.

But in the present case I think we are in a totally different category. This company are really themselves woolbrokers. They purchased a woolbroking business and took it up. They undertook a large agency business in connection with the purchase and sale of wool. In connection with their commission business they find it necessary to make large advances, taking for these advances certain securities. Part of such securities appears to be mortgages; but the larger part consists of moveable property, such as wool, hides, and other articles of that kind. The interest which they receive is, as your Lordship has observed, practically the same as is drawn by a banker upon a current account. They advance so much money, and, as the proceeds of goods received in security come in, they credit the sums received. They charge interest for the use of the money until it is repaid, just as an ordinary commission-agent or a banker who has made advances does. It is quite unlike a case of investment. The interest fluctuates; it is for no fixed period; the transaction may be closed at any time; in short, it is the case of a woolbroker combining with his business that of a banker. Now, I should say it is very clear that if this had been the case of a banking company carrying on the business of a bank here, with a branch in one of the colonies, and thus receiving abroad interests and discounts as profits of their business in the ordinary way in which banking business is transacted, that would not be a case which would fall under the fourth case, which appears to me to be the case applying to investments. If such a banking company or insurance company made investments of their realised funds in stocks in the colonies which were paying them interest periodically, that would, so far as these investments were concerned, be a very different matter. But just as it appears to me that you could not under the fourth case include a banking company carrying on the ordinary business of bankers, so as little do I think you could include under the fourth case this woolbroking company, which makes advances as part of its woolbroking business and ancillary to it, and gets interest on current accounts as part of its profits in the same way as commissions received. It appears to me plainly to fall under the first case, and that under that case alone can this charge be made.

LORD ADAM.—In my opinion the money here which is said to yield interest so as to bring it under case four of schedule D is simply neither more nor less than money used by the company in the ordinary carrying on of its business and trade. That being so, I think the return from such money is neither more nor less than trade profit, and, being so, that it falls under the first case in schedule D and not under the fourth case. I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the Commissioners ought to be affirmed.

The Court accordingly answered the first branch of the question in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

Henry Thomson & Company, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—
Sir Charles Pearson—Ure.
James Robertson, Defender (Respondent).—Asher—Shaw.

Trade name—Interdict.—In order to entitle a wholesale dealer to interdict against a retail dealer selling over his counter goods on the representation that they are of the pursuer's manufacture, when in point of fact they are not, it is not sufficient to prove that in a few instances, when goods of the pursuer's manufacture were asked for, other goods were supplied.

2d Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

In January 1888, Henry Thomson & Company, wholesale whisky merchants, Newry, Ireland, brought an action against James Robertson, spirit merchant, 157 Seagate, Dundee, concluding for declarator, "that the defender is not entitled to sell or offer for sale by himself, or others acting under or for him, as whisky manufactured or blended by the pursuers, whisky not manufactured or blended by or for the pursuers, or to supply in implement of orders or requests for Henry Thomson's whisky, or Henry Thomson & Company's whisky, or of similar orders or requests, whisky not manufactured or blended by or for the pursuers," for interdict against the defender, by himself or others, so selling, offering for sale, or supplying whisky, and for £100 of damages.

The pursuers stated that they were blenders of whisky at Newry, Ireland, and had carried on business as blenders and exporters of whisky for a period of upwards of twenty-five years; that during that time the whisky manufactured and blended by them, which was known as "Henry Thomson & Company's old Irish whisky," had acquired a great reputation both at home and abroad; that they had recently become aware that the defender "has been in the habit of wilfully and fraudulently in his said shop selling as the pursuers' whisky, in reply to orders or requests for that whisky, whisky or other liquor not manufactured or blended by them, and known by the defender not to be manufactured or blended by or for the pursuers, on the false pretence, made by the defender or by his shopmen and servants, that such whisky or other liquor was whisky manufactured or blended by the pursuers. The whisky or other liquor sold by the defender was of a quality inferior to the whisky manufactured and blended by the pursuers"; and that in particular the defender had habitually so offered for sale and sold whisky during 1886 and 1887, and particularly during July, August, September, and October 1887. Then followed a specification of such sales to Annie Fee and Janet Ross "on several occasions" in July and August 1887, and on about a dozen occasions specified during the above four months to Robert M'Gregor and John M'Naughton usually when together, and occasionally when one or other of them was in company with other men named.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender having wilfully and fraudulently offered for sale, and sold as whisky manufactured or blended by the pursuers, whisky which was not so manufactured or blended, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator and to interdict as craved.

The defender stated that he did not keep the pursuers' whisky, and that neither he nor his assistants had ever sold or offered for sale whisky on the representation that it was the pursuers'.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No relevant case. (2) The defender not having sold whisky on the representations averred by the pursuers, and not having done or proposed to do anything in infringement of the pursuers' legal rights, the action is unnecessary, and should be dismissed.

A proof was allowed.

David Brown, traveller to the pursuers, deponed,—"I live in Dundee. I was informed last year that defender was selling whisky as Henry Thomson & Company's, which was not theirs. I received the information from the late William Fee, who lived in Queen Street, Dundee. He chaffed me on the subject, and said, 'Some of our folks in Dundee are selling other whisky for Henry Thomson's.' He told me he had got it himself. He gave me to understand that he used Henry Thomson & Company's whisky for the sake of his health. . . . I was instructed by the pursuers to look into the case and find out if what Fee had stated was true. I employed for the purpose a man named Robert M'Gregor. He was in my employment, and I thought he would be a suitable man. He has been in my employment for some time doing all sorts of work, such as delivering goods, and so on. I consulted with him as to whom he should have with him, and it was arranged that he should take a man M'Naughton. I knew him before. So far as I knew he was a trustworthy man also." Witness then deponed that these men, and subsequently two others, went to the defender's shop and bought whisky there, which they brought to witness.

The girl Fee, aged thirteen, gave this evidence;—"When my father sent me for whisky he told me to ask for Henry Thomson's, and that was always what I asked for. I went to defender's for whisky last year." Witness deponed that she generally went to a grocer's shop for whisky, but when that was shut she went to defender's shop. "(Q.) When you went into defender's what did you ask for? (A.) Henry Thomson. I wanted the whisky my father had sent me for. I know defender. It was generally the waiter that I saw when I went to the shop . . . When he handed it to me I said 'Is that the right thing?' and he said 'Yes.' I only told my father sometimes where I had got the whisky. He said sometimes it was not the right thing I had got. My father was particular about getting Henry Thomson's whisky. He found it did him more good than other whisky; if he took any other kind it made him ill. He was sometimes ill after he had taken what I brought him from defender's, and complained that it was not Henry Thomson's because it made him ill. . . . I have known him taste what I brought from defender's and say it was not Henry Thomson's whisky. I went to defender's for whisky several times. I was once or twice served by defender himself. I always asked for Henry Thomson's whisky."

The evidence of Janet Ross, aged twelve, a step-daughter of Fee, was to the same general effect as regards occasions on which she had gone for whisky for her father. And his evidence, which was taken on commission, before his death, corroborated his daughter's generally.

Robert M'Gregor who had been employed by the pursuers' traveller Brown, deponed,—"We went to defender's shop for the first time on 31st August, between nine and ten o'clock in the morning. We had some sundries, and then we asked for half-a-mutchkin of Henry Thomson's Newry Irish whisky. Henry Thomson's whisky is well known in Dundee. It is commonly called Henry Thomson & Company's whisky. The shopman served me. He took the whisky from the crane next the Seagate, behind the bar. I don't remember whether it was M'Naughton or I who gave the order on this occasion, but I remember it being given. I gave M'Naughton 2s. 6d. before we went in, to pay for the purchases. After we had got the whisky we left the shop" and took the whisky to Brown. "I was thirteen times in defender's shop altogether between 31st August and the beginning of October," either with M'Naughton or one of the other men, and on these occasions they were served either by the defender or by a shopman. M'Gregor's evidence regarding the other occasions was to the same effect, and it was corroborated generally by that of M'Naughton and the other men. Witness stated that he always asked for "Henry Thomson & Company's Newry Irish whisky."

The defender and his assistant deponed, generally, that they did not keep and never had kept the pursuers' whisky, that the Irish whisky they kept was Kirker, Green, & Company's, that the defender's own practice and his instructions to his assistants were to tell customers who asked for a special maker's whisky which the defender had not got, that they had not got it, but that they had a good Irish or Scotch whisky, as the case might be, which the customers were usually content to take, and that this applied to the girl Fee and her sister, and to M'Gregor and the other men—that they were content to take "Irish."

Several other witnesses for the defender deponed that they themselves had been told that the defender did not sell pursuers' whisky, or had heard the defender or his assistant tell other people so.

On 13th March 1888, the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it not proved that the defender has fraudulently or wrongfully represented that he is a seller of Henry Thomson & Company's old Irish whisky: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusion of the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that the pursuers have failed to establish their case, and I shall state in a few words what I think is necessary to be proved in a case of this description.

"Every manufacturer, and I think every wholesale dealer, or dealer of any kind, is entitled to be protected against the use of his firm name without his authority, even if the right is rested on no other or higher ground than the annoyance which may result from being supposed to be responsible for transactions with which you have nothing to do. That is a legitimate interest; and, besides, it is very obvious that if one trader passes off goods under the name of another trader, it is because he wishes to take the benefit of the reputation which that other trader has acquired. Such reputation does not necessarily follow from his being the manufacturer of the goods which he sells. It may be due to his commercial skill, as being a good judge of goods, and the care which he uses in selecting them. Against any fraudulent use of their name I do not doubt that Messrs Henry Thomson & Company are entitled to be protected. If there were evidence that the defender had either advertised that he sold the pursuers' whisky, or had exhibited their show-cards in his shop, or put the pursuers' name upon handbills, or had voluntarily stated to any customer that he sold Henry Thomson & Company's whisky, that would have been a case for interdict, without proof either of deception or resulting damage. It would be a clear case of the illegal use of another person's trade name. But the case is more delicate when it depends mainly upon the circumstance that goods of a particular firm have been asked for, and goods not coming from that firm supplied. In such a case everything, I think, ought to be presumed in favour of the dealer; especially if he gives instructions to his assistants that when goods which he does not keep are asked for they are to explain to the customer that they are not kept, but that goods of an equivalent quality are kept, and will be supplied. I should not be prepared to grant interdict in a case of this kind upon proof that in one or two instances some customer had asked for Henry Thomson & Company's whisky and had got the nearest whisky to that which was in the shop. I think it would be ridiculous to hold that a few instances of that kind amounted to an invasion of right. The thing is casual; there is no evidence of design or intention to injure; and probably it is in such a case the result of inadvertence. Now, in the present case there is not even evidence to this extent, if we except the supply of whisky on three or four occasions to an old infirm man of the name of Fee, who occasionally sent members of his family to purchase a glass of whisky for him. He had a fancy for Henry Thomson & Company's whisky, and his daughters knew of this preference, and asked for the pursuers' whisky when they were sent for it. They say that they were not told that the whisky given to them was of a different mark. The defender's shopman, on the other hand, says that he did tell them, and he is confirmed in regard to one of the occasions by the evidence of a customer who happened to be in the shop at the time. It must therefore be regarded as at least a very doubtful question whether the whisky was in fact supplied in answer to a demand for Henry Thomson & Company's. I have great doubts whether the whisky was supplied without the necessary explanation being made. Even if the facts were as the pursuers allege, in the circumstances I should not hold this to be sufficient evidence to support an application for interdict.

"The other cases founded on rest on the evidence of four witnesses who were sent by the pursuers' firm to make purchases with the view of finding out whether the defender was in the habit of supplying whisky in answer to a demand for theirs. I must say I was not favourably impressed with the evidence of the first and principal witness, M'Gregor. He began by stating what it was he asked for—that he asked for Henry Thomson & Company's old Newry Irish whisky; and he insisted that on every one of the ten or twelve occasions that he went there he asked for the whisky in these precise terms. That seems to me a very unlikely thing. If he did so, I think it must have come to be looked upon as a joke between him and the shopman—not meaning anything. But that was his statement; and then he added that he was always supplied with whisky. But he was not very communicative as to any other facts that transpired on his visits, or as to conversations which may have taken place. And I think, without being hard upon this witness, that it may reasonably be supposed that he was at least once or twice told that Henry Thomson & Company's whisky was not kept on the premises, especially as he does not expressly negative this supposition. But the evidence of the defender and his shopman is quite clear, the one as to the instructions given, and the other that he perfectly remembered telling M'Gregor on more than one occasion that he did not keep Henry Thomson's whisky, but that he would supply him with something equally good. If that were done once for all, and M'Gregor made aware of the fact, I cannot for a moment entertain the idea that injury was done to Henry Thomson & Company by reason of this statement not being repeated every time that M'Gregor asked for their whisky. The shopman knew that M'Gregor was aware that this was not Henry Thomson's whisky. To take a parallel case, it is a matter of common experience that many people, or say a thirsty traveller entering a hotel, will call for a glass of 'Bass' beer,' without caring in the least whether the beer supplied to them is made by Lord Burton's firm or not. It is understood by both parties that what is wanted is simply a good quality of bitter beer. If the customer makes it plain that he really wants the beer of a particular maker, and something different is supplied to him coming from a different maker, that is a fraud for which the law will give redress. In the employed by the pursuers, who spoke to the sale of whisky as the pursuers', when it was not.

The defender argued;—It had not been proved that the defender had ever sold whisky on the representation that it was the pursuers'. Even if on one or two occasions he or his assistant had given whisky in return for a request for the pursuers' without intimating that it was not the pursuers', that was due to a blunder on their part, and was not sufficient to justify an interdict.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that there is here a very slender ground of action, viewed even at its best. It is an action against a retail dealer in whisky in Dundee by a blender of whisky in Ireland, and the pursuers' complaint is that the defender has sold whisky over his counter on the false statement that it had been blended by the pursuers. That is not a very large-hearted ground of action. Dealers in such articles often give their articles names which they do not altogether deserve, and their customers probably do not much rely on the existence of the qualities which the names may imply. I am very clear that only a strong and flagrant case would induce the Court to interfere in such an action as this.

Apparently the case is of this nature: It is said that the defender, on various occasions between the months of July and October 1887—for the complaint and the evidence are limited to that period,—sold over the counter whisky which he represented as being Henry Thomson & Company's Irish whisky, when in reality it was the whisky of someone else; and there are witnesses who come forward and say that on these occasions they asked for Henry Thomson & Company's Irish whisky, but were supplied by the defender or his shopman with something else. Now, even if all that these witnesses say is to be taken as accurate, it would not, I think, lead to the conclusion which the pursuers seek to deduce from it. But I am not sure that this evidence is to be credited in all its details. The Lord Ordinary does not appear altogether to believe it. At all events he is of opinion that the pursuers have failed to make out a case of systematic fraud on the part of the defender. I am disposed to adopt the view of the Lord Ordinary, and to affirm his judgment.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and with what I understand to be your Lordship's opinion, that the present case I am quite clear that, after the first or second time, both parties perfectly understood that Henry Thomson & Company's whisky was not kept and was not wanted, although the form may have been gone through of asking for a glass of 'Henry Thomson.' In that case no injury was done. Of course the use of this kind of evidence is to furnish reasonable grounds for the belief that other customers are treated in the same way, and that a system of deception is practised upon the public. Now, no evidence has been adduced by the pursuers to shew that there is any considerable demand for Henry Thomson & Company's whisky which has been interfered with by the defender. And in the second place, not one single instance—or at least only the one instance that I have mentioned—can be found of any customer from the public asking for Henry Thomson & Company's whisky and being deceived. And therefore I think the absence of all confirmation by outside testimony entirely displaces the inference that might, under other circumstances, be drawn from what M'Gregor and his companions have repeated.

"I shall find that no fraudulent representation has been proved on the part of the defender, and that he is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses."

pursuers have failed to prove in point of fact that the defender held himself out to the public as a dealer in Henry Thomson & Company's Irish whisky. I think that no fraudulent conduct has been proved against the defender. It may be quite true that on one or two occasions people entering the defender's shop and asking for Henry Thomson & Company's Irish whisky may through some mistake have been supplied with Kirker, Green, & Company's—which it appears was the Irish whisky that the defender did keep—without being told that such was the fact. That is quite possible, but I doubt whether even that has been proved. Taking it to be proved, however, I am of opinion that it is not sufficient to warrant us in granting this interdict against the defender. A case of this kind is not to be established by evidence of a few petty instances of the wrong use of a dealer's name, but upon proof of a continued and systematic course of fraudulent misrepresentation and dealing. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that such proof is here wanting. I think he has dealt with the case with great propriety, and I entirely agree with him and with your Lordship.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also concur. I think that the pursuers have entirely failed to prove their case.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.
I.

THE MORNINGSIDE COLLEGE COMPANY was the owner of a piece of ground, with buildings thereon, at Morningside, Edinburgh. The company were assessed for the relief of the poor for the year from Whitsunday 1887 to Whitsunday 1888 by notice issued on 1st October 1887; the assessment became due from the date of the notice, the last day for payment being 28th January 1888.

On 12th January 1888 the North British Property Investment Company, Limited, creditors in certain sums contained in bonds and dispositions in security granted by the Morningside College Company, presented a petition of poinding of the ground in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles in order to attach the moveables thereon in satisfaction of the principal sums and interest due under the bonds.

On 13th January 1888, after service of the petition, the Morningside College Company, being unable by reason of its liabilities to continue its business, resolved on voluntary liquidation, and appointed a liquidator. At that date the poor-rates were still unpaid.

North British Property Investment Co., Limited, v. Paterson.

On 27th January 1888 decree was obtained in absence in the action of poinding of the ground.

On 5th April 1888 the liquidator having declined to pay the poor-rates until it should be seen whether the expenses of winding up would not exhaust all the funds in his hands, the collector obtained warrant to poind and distrain the goods and effects of the Morningside College Company for payment of the assessment, and on 14th April an officer executed a poinding under his instructions.

The North British Property Investment Company, Limited, thereupon presented in the Sheriff Court an application for interdict against the collector carrying away and selling the subjects contained in their poinding.

They pleaded;—(1) By the service of the petition in the said action of poinding the ground, and decree following thereon, the pursuers have acquired a real and preferable right to the articles of furniture condescended on, and interdict should be granted as prayed for. (2) The said articles not being poindable or distrainable by the defenders, in respect of the execution of the petition in the action of poinding the ground, interdict should be granted, with expenses. (4) The Morningside College Company, Limited, being insolvent, and the assessment claimed by the defender Paterson being thus payable only out of the first proceeds of the estate, the diligence executed by him was incompetent.

The defender stated "that any debt due to the pursuers is of a private nature, and the Morningside College Company, Limited, is bankrupt or insolvent, and has been so since at least 1st January last."

They pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant. (3) The poor-rates sought to be recovered by the defender Paterson being preferable to the debt alleged to be due to the pursuers, and his diligence for the recovery thereof being orderly proceeded, he is entitled to have the interdict refused, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) sustained the defender's first plea in law, and dismissed the action.

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Crichton), who pronounced this interlocutor:—After findings in fact to the effect above set forth—" Finds in point of law that by the service of the action of poinding of the ground the pursuers acquired a legal and preferable right to the articles of furniture mentioned in the prayer of the petition in this action: Therefore grants interdict as craved." *

* " NOTE.—The pursuers, who are heritable creditors of the Morningside College Company, obtained decree against the company in an action of poinding of the ground on 27th January 1888. On 5th April 1888 the defender James Paterson, who is collector of poor and school-rates for the Combination of St Cuthbert's, obtained warrant to poind the goods and effects of the College Company in payment of the poor and school-rates then due, and proceeded to carry out the said warrant by poinding the articles mentioned in the prayer of the petition. The pursuers now ask that the defender be interdicted from carrying away the said articles or advertising them for sale.

" The defender contended that the pursuers were not entitled to interdict, because, under section 88 of the Poor-Law Act (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83) and section 33 of 43 George III. cap. 150, his right to the moveable goods and effects belonging to the College Company was preferable to that of the pursuers. The 88th section of the Poor-Law Act provides that 'all remedies and provisions enacted for collecting, levying, and recovering the land-tax and assessed taxes, or either of them, and other public taxes, shall be held to be applicable to assessments imposed for relief of the poor.' The 44th section of the Education Act (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62) provides that 'the school-rate shall in all cases

The Collector of Poor-rates appealed, and argued;—The Sheriff had proceeded upon the Act 43 Geo. III. c. 150, which was repealed by the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 19, section 4, schedule 3). That statute, however, contained a provision practically identical with that founded on by the Sheriff, and the error could have made no difference to his judgment. The question therefore was, whether a heritable creditor who had served a summons of poinding of the ground and got decree upon it, was preferable to the collector of public rates and taxes. That question fell to be decided favourably to the latter (1) in respect of the Taxes Management Act, 1880*; and (2) in respect of the 88th section of the Poor-Law be levied and collected in the same manner as poor's assessment, and the laws applicable for the time to the imposition, collection, and recovery of poor assessment shall be applicable to the school-rates.' The provision with regard to the recovery of taxes is contained in section 33 of 43 George III. cap. 150, which enacts 'that no moveable goods or effects whatever belonging to any person or persons, at the time any of the said duties assessed under the regulations of this Act become in arrear, shall be liable to be taken by virtue of any arrestment, poinding, sequestration, or diligence whatever, or by virtue of any assignation, on any account or pretence whatever, unless the party at whose instance the said diligence shall be used, . . . shall, before the sale or removal of such goods or effects, pay or cause to be paid to the collector or collectors of the said duties so due all arrears of the said duties which shall be due at the time of arresting, poinding, or seizing such goods or effects, or which shall be payable for the year in which such diligence shall be used, provided the duties shall not be claimed for more than one year.' It is clear from these enactments that any creditor of the College Company is precluded from taking the moveable goods or effects belonging to the company by 'arrestment, poinding, or sequestration,' except on payment of the arrears of the poor and school-rates, not exceeding one year. It appears to the Sheriff, however, that the poinding mentioned in the statute means a personal poinding. No doubt the words 'or diligence whatever' are used, but this, it is thought, refers to diligence of the same kind as 'arrestment, poinding (that is, personal poinding), or sequestration,' and does not include poinding of the ground. It has been said that there are few things which have the same descriptive name, and yet are so essentially different in their nature as the process of poinding the ground, and that of poinding for a personal debt; with regard to the effect of a poinding of the ground, the observations by the Lord President in the recent case of Athole Hydropathic Company, Limited, in Liquidation, against Scottish Provincial Assurance Company, 19th March 1886, 13 R. 818, are of importance. In that case his Lordship said,—'The security which a heritable creditor holds over moveables is of exactly the same nature, and has the same effect as that which he holds over the fundus itself. In extent, of course, it varies with the amount of moveables on the ground, but his right to them is secured by his infeftment, not by his action of poinding of the ground. A heritable creditor therefore in raising his action is not seeking to obtain a preference, but to give effect to a preference which is already his. A poinding of the ground is a proceeding merely for the purpose of giving effect to a creditor's security, and it is analogous to those other remedies open to heritable creditors, such as adjudication, or sale, or maills and duties. These are all diligences open to an heritable creditor to give effect to his preference which has already been secured to him. He has a preference against all the world. No one can compete with him, and therefore, as far as a security extends, he is entitled to make it effectual.' These observations seem to be applicable to the present case, and the interdict prayed for has accordingly been granted."

* 43 and 44 Vict. c. 19, sec. 88.—"No goods or chattels whatever belonging to any person at the time any of the duties or the land-tax became in arrear shall be liable to be taken by virtue of any execution or other process, warrant, or authority whatever, or by virtue of any assignment, on any account or pre-

Act, 1845.* The concluding words of that section applied to the case of insolvency, which was the case with the debtor, the Morningside College Company. The respondents were private creditors, and could not compete with the collector of public rates. It was said, on the other side, on the authority of the Athole Hydropathic Company, Limited, v. the Scottish Provincial Insurance Company,[1] that a heritable creditor poinding the ground was preferable to all the other creditors, having "a preference against all the world," as the Lord President stated it. But that was not a competition between public rates and private debts, and his Lordship's opinion was not intended to be read as applying to such a competition. The diligence of the Crown was preferable to the diligence of the subject, however far it had proceeded, and these public rates were by the statute placed on the same level with Crown taxes.

Argued for the respondents;—On 12th January, before the liquidation, the respondents raised and served their process of poinding the ground. That placed a nexus on the goods on the ground and made them subject to the heritable creditors' claim just as the land itself was.[2] The result was that there was a completed security. It was of no consequence that the debt was a private one, for the 88th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, while providing that the poor-rates should be preferable to "all other debts of a private nature" did not purport to affect existing and completed securities. Further, the same section provided that the rates should be paid "out of the first proceeds of the estate." It would therefore fall to a trustee or liquidator in a bankruptcy to pay them out of the first funds in his hands, but he would get no such funds till the preference of the heritable creditor who had poinded the ground was satisfied. Even assuming that these arguments were erroneous, the Taxes Management Act, 1880, gave a preference only for taxes which had "become in arrear" over the claims of ordinary personal creditors. But these rates were not in arrear when decree was obtained in the action of poinding the ground, for though the notices were issued in October the ratepayers had till 28th January to pay them, and they could not be "in arrear" till that day was passed, and proceedings could be taken to recover them. It was probably true that in the Athole Hydropathic case[3] the Lord President was tence whatever except at the suit of the landlord for rent, unless the party at whose suit the said execution or seizure shall be sued or made, or to whom such assignment shall be made, shall before the sale or removal of such goods or chattels pay or cause to be paid to the collector all arrears of the said duties or land-tax which shall be due at the time of seizing such goods or chattels, or which shall be payable for the year in which such seizure shall be made, provided such duties and land-tax shall not be claimed for more than one year."

* The Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 88, enacts "That the whole powers and rights of issuing summary warrants and proceedings and all remedies and provisions enacted for collecting, levying, and recovering the land and assessed taxes, or either of them, and other public taxes shall be held to be applicable to assessments imposed for the relief of the poor . . . and all assessments for the relief of the poor shall, in case of bankruptcy or insolvency, be paid out of the first proceeds of the estate, and shall be preferable to all other debts of a private nature due by the parties assessed."

not speaking of public taxes; but the principle of that case, that the completed diligence of the heritable creditor excluded all other claims, applied.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am unable to see any difficulty here. The Sheriff seems to have gone off on a case which appears to me to have no application.

Paterson, the defender, appeals against a decree which the pursuers have obtained interdicting him from interfering with certain property in the premises of the Morningside College Company, which are subject to the rates which it is his duty to collect—poor-rates, education-rates, rates in every possible respect of a public character as distinguished from private debts. The Poor-Law Act substantially enacts that the rates and taxes therein dealt with shall have a preference over the diligence of all ordinary creditors. Certain kinds of diligence are specifically mentioned, and poinding of the ground is not among the number, but it would be a strong thing to say that, on that account, it shall have the effect of conferring a preference over the rates, for the reason of the clause is quite plain—the rates must be paid. We are not in the category of competing creditors at all. The property must pay the rates, no matter into whose hands it may happen to pass. The distinctions arising with reference to the preferences of ordinary creditors have no bearing on this case.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff ought to be recalled.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I must confess to feeling some surprise that the learned Sheriff should have decided as he has done. The case appears to me too clear for argument.

The defender is the collector of the poor-rates and the education-rates for the St Cuthbert's Combination, for the year 1886-87, which became due and were exigible on and after October 1887. The rates were imposed on the Morningside College Company, and were payable by the proprietor thereof. The College Company went into voluntary liquidation in January 1888,—that is to say, a few months after the rates became due and exigible, but a certain latitude as to the time of payment is given to the ratepayers for their convenience, and in the case of those having any considerable property with perfect safety. When that latitude had expired the collector applied to the liquidator for the rates due from the college, but he declined to pay, because he said he had no money. The collector thereupon proceeded to poind the moveables in the premises of the college, but after he had done so these money-lending creditors come forward and object to the collector going on with the sale of the poinded goods. "We have a heritable security over the property," they say, "and we have poinded the ground, and we do not mean that any rates shall be paid in respect of it until our debt is satisfied." The object of the present action is to have the sale of the moveables by the appellant under his poinding interdicted, because these creditors say that their poinding of the ground gives them a preference over the appellant's claim as tax-collector. They maintain that they are entitled to sell the house and the moveable property in it for their own debts, and to exclude the other ratepayers altogether. For that is the effect of it. The rates must be paid somehow, unless the paupers are to be starved, and if you are not entitled to get the rates from these people you must take the more from those who do pay. That is really the meaning of the preference which the statute confers on the rate collector. Its object is to ensure that the money required to be raised by the rates is made good as far as possible by all the property equally.

Now, what is the pretence which this heritable company puts forward as a ground for preventing payment of the rates? It is that a poinding of the ground is a sort of diligence which creates a different kind of attachment from that resulting from any other diligence, and in support of this contention the case of the Athole Hydropathic Company, 13 R. 818, is referred to, and particularly certain passages in the Lord President's opinion. Apparently there was a question in that case under the Liquidation Acts, whether a poinding of the ground subsequent in date to the liquidation entitled the poinding creditor to a preference over the ordinary creditors. I should humbly have been of opinion that it did not, but we are not required to decide that here, and therefore we may assume that it did. We were, however, referred to an expression of opinion by the Lord President, which is in these terms:—"The security which a heritable creditor holds over moveables is of exactly the same nature and has the same effect as that which he holds over the fundus itself. In extent, of course, it varies with the amount of moveables on the ground, but his right to them is secured by his infeftment, not by his action of poinding of the ground. A heritable creditor, therefore, in raising his action is not seeking to obtain a preference, but to give effect to a preference which is already his. A poinding of the ground is a proceeding merely for the purpose of giving effect to a creditor's security, and it is analogous to those other remedies open to heritable creditors, such as adjudication, or sale, or maills and duties. These are all diligences open to an heritable creditor to give effect to his preference which has already been secured to him. He has a preference against all the world. No one can compete with him, and therefore, as far as a security extends, he is entitled to make it effectual."

Now, a poinding of the ground is just what our neighbours across the Tweed would call an impounding of what is on the ground. There must be some antecedent right in the poinding creditor entitling him to poind, but what he does is simply to impound what actually is on the ground. Before the goods came on to the ground he could have no right whatever to them as a heritable creditor. They may not have been there five minutes before his diligence was executed, and he may have invoked the aid of this legal process for the very reason that he has seen the goods taken on to the ground. He has no right by attachment to the goods before he has poinded the ground, but if he presents his application, relying on the antecedent warrant, and obtains a decree of poinding, I should have thought that the date of the attachment was the date of the application, and that it did not draw back to the date of the bond, when the property which it is sought to attach need not have been, probably was not, on the ground. But we are not required to consider that question here. Assume the poinding to be of any date you please—and it was only a question of date that the Lord President was considering—it is nevertheless a poinding of goods in a house which is subject to the rights of the tax-collector for his rates, and these rights give him a preference over all other and private creditors.

I have said so much, as however clear we may regard a case, when we alter the judgment of a learned Sheriff on a point of general interest and importance,

Dawson v. Thorburn.

Mary Ann Dawson, Pursuer (Respondent).—Young—Forsyth.
Thomas Thorburn, Defender (Appellant).—Gloag—Shaw.

Bankruptcy—Act 1621, c. 18—Conjunct and confident person—Conveyance by insolvent to prejudice of creditor—Just and necessary cause.—A father who was insolvent, and had no other property than the furniture of a lodging-house, conveyed the furniture to his daughter on the narrative that she had for fifteen years acted as his housekeeper without remuneration. A creditor of the father, whose debt existed at the date of the conveyance, obtained decree for his debt and poinded the furniture. In a petition for interdict presented by the daughter against the sale of the furniture, the only evidence adduced by her in proof of her claim against her father was her own testimony to the effect that she had acted as a domestic servant to him for fifteen years without wages. Held that she had failed to prove that the disposition by her father to her had been granted for a just and necessary cause, and interdict refused.

Sheriff of Stirling and Dumbarton.
I.

William Dawson was for many years prior to 1886 proprietor of a house in Bridge of Allan, which was occupied as a lodging-house. In 1861 he borrowed on the security of it £700, and in 1877 £150, from the trustees of a Mr Baird. In 1882 he further borrowed on the security of the house £125 from Thomas Thorburn, to whom he granted an ex facie absolute disposition qualified by a back-bond.

The interest having fallen into arrear Baird's trustees served on Dawson schedules of intimation, requisition, and protest in February 1886. They also executed a poinding of the ground.

At a third exposure of the property it was purchased by Mary Ann Dawson, Dawson's daughter, who lived with him, for £855. A disposition in her favour, to which Thorburn was a party, was granted by Baird's trustees. On 6th January 1887 Dawson disponed to her all the furniture in the house, conform to inventory annexed to the disposition, which furniture had been attached by the poinding of the ground. The narrative of the disposition bore "that my daughter Mary Ann Dawson, residing with me, has for the last fifteen years acted as my housekeeper and otherwise assisted me and her mother without any remuneration being hitherto paid to her, and which I estimate at the sum of £100." On 19th March 1887 Mary Ann Dawson obtained from Baird's trustees an assignation to their decree of poinding the ground. The consideration for this assignation was a sum of £19, 7s. 8d., the balance due to them by Dawson, after applying the £855, the price of the house. In May 1887 Thorburn raised an action against Dawson for the £125 due to him, and obtained decree in absence. On this decree he gave a charge and then proceeded to poind the furniture in the house on the footing that it was still Dawson's.

Mary Ann Dawson then presented a petition to the Sheriff for interdict against Dawson selling the furniture. She averred that it was hers and not her father's, and founded both on the assignation to the poinding of the ground and on the disposition by her father in her favour.

The defender admitted that by reason of the assignation to the poinding of the ground the pursuer was preferable to him to the extent of the £19, 17s. 8d., the balance due under the bonds, which the pursuer had paid to Baird's trustees. He denied that she had any other right to compete with him. He averred that the disposition by William Dawson was executed when he was insolvent, and that it was in favour of his daughter, a conjunct and confident person, without just, true, and necessary causes, and without a just price really paid.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said disposition having conveyed and made over to pursuer the said furniture and other effects, the said defender was not entitled to poind them for a debt alleged to be due by the said William Dawson, and his doing so was most illegal and unwarrantable.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The disposition produced having been granted by Mr Dawson when he was insolvent, in favour of a conjunct and confident person, "without just and true and necessary causes, and without a just price really paid," is struck at by the Act 1621, cap. 18, is liable to exception in this process, and the pursuer founding on it is not entitled to interdict.

A proof was led. It appeared from the pursuer's testimony in addition to the facts already stated, that she was about thirty-one years of age, had resided with her father all her life, and for fifteen years had assisted in the house, which they used as a lodging-house, doing the work of a cook, and except in the busy season, of a housemaid as well. She had no bargain with her father for wages, and never got any, but got money from him to buy her dresses. For five years before the action, during which time her mother had been insane and in an asylum, she had managed the house in addition to doing the domestic work of it. At the time of the disposition of the furniture to her (as to which the pursuer deponed that it was arranged in December 1886 that she should purchase the house as a lodging-house, and that her father should make over to her the furniture, so far as not carried away by the decree of poinding of the ground), her father had no other effects than the furniture, which was worth about £100. The pursuer deponed that she considered that sum due to her for her fifteen years' service in the house.

Dawson, who was over eighty, was, at the time of the proof, too feeble to be examined as a witness, and he died during the dependence of the action.

The Sheriff-substitute (Buntine) found that the assignation was not a gratuitous alienation, but was granted for an onerous consideration; therefore repelled the defender's second plea in law, and made perpetual an interim interdict which had been granted.

On appeal the Sheriff (Muirhead) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) That the pursuer gave her domestic services to her father, the deceased William Dawson, for fifteen years, receiving board and lodging and money to buy dresses, &c., but no wages: (2) That the disposition of household furniture, &c., of 6th January 1887, by the said William Dawson to the pursuer, was in consideration of said unwaged service: Finds in law, that said disposition was granted for a just cause in the sense of the Act 1621, cap. 18: In respect of these findings, recalls the finding on the merits in the interlocutor appealed against: Quoad ultra adheres to said interlocutor, and of new declares the interdict perpetual."* No. 164.

* "NOTE.— . . . The third ground upon which interdict is craved by the pursuer is that the furniture, &c., in question is hers, and cannot be sold by the defender in execution of the decree obtained by him against her father. To this the defender replies that the conveyance of it to her is struck at by the Act 1621, cap. 18, that she is conjunct, that it was without true, just, and necessary cause, and that her father was insolvent at the date of granting. There can be no question that the pursuer was conjunct with her father, and the Sheriff-substitute seems to have been of opinion that Mr Dawson on 6th January 1887, though not notour bankrupt, was, nevertheless, insolvent. In this I agree with him. I have more hesitation in concurring in his opinion that the consideration for the conveyance was sufficient to exclude the operation of the statute. It is thus set forth in the deed,—'That my daughter, Mary Ann Dawson, residing with me, has for the last fifteen years acted as my housekeeper, and otherwise assisted me and her mother without any remuneration being hitherto paid to her, and which I estimate at the sum of £100.' It is proved that Mr Dawson, at one time a joiner, but latterly disabled by old age, had for many years occupied the house now belonging to the pursuer, and had been in the practice, during the season, of letting part of it to lodgers. It was only during the season that he hired a domestic; during the rest of the year, and at all times before he began to let rooms, the household service was done by his wife and two daughters. Neither of the latter ever made any bargain for wages, and never got any—only 'money to buy dresses, &c.' The elder sister married about ten years ago, and it is not said that her father then gave her anything in recognition of her services. The mother has been laid aside for about five years, and for the last three been in an asylum, and the pursuer has, for that time, had the management of the house. She has worked in it altogether for fifteen years, i.e., since she was sixteen years old, but, latterly, according to her own account, it has been as mistress of the establishment. For she says in her evidence,—'My father retired about five years ago; and since then I have kept lodgers, and my father has stayed with me.'

"I am very far from saying that the conveyance of his furniture, &c., said to be worth £70, which Mr Dawson made to the pursuer in January 1886, was an unreasonable recognition of her prolonged and unwaged service. But I doubt very much whether she could have compelled her father to pay her £70, or any smaller sum in consideration of that service. In other words, I do not think there was any 'necessary cause' for the conveyance. The interpretation that has been put upon the statute, however, distinguishes between 'just' and 'necessary,' so that though there be no 'previous obligation, yet if the deed be granted for a true and just cause, it is not reducible.'—(Kilkerran's Report of Grant v. Grant, 1748, M. 952.) From this point of view the question comes to be—are domestic services rendered for fifteen years by a daughter to her father, with whom she has all the time lived in family, receiving from him such money as she required for 'dresses, &c.,' but nothing in name of wages, a 'just' cause or consideration for the conveyance to her by her father of £70 worth of furniture, he being at the moment insolvent? But for the recent decision in Hodge v. Morrison, 1883 (21 S. L. R. 40), I should have some difficulty in answering it in the affirmative. In that case daughters living in family with their father, but carrying on a laundry business on their own account, contributed part of their earnings towards the support of the domestic establishment, and those contributions were held to be a sufficient consideration for a subsequent conveyance to them by their father, notwithstanding his alleged insolvency. In principle, I am unable to distinguish between that case and the present. Therefore, although I cannot go the length the Sheriff-substitute does, in thinking that 'the pursuer had a valid claim against her father, which she might have vindicated by an action in the event of his disputing it,' I feel constrained, in deference to the judgment in Hodge, to hold that the conveyance to her proceeded on a 'just' cause, and is consequently protected by the statute."

Dawson v. Thorburn.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The conveyance of the furniture, Dawson's only asset, to his daughter was not fair and reasonable, having in view that it wholly deprived his creditor of any fund for payment of a debt to the claim for which he had no defence. In the case of Hodge, on which the Sheriff founded, the disposition was given two years before insolvency, and in respect of money contributions by the granter's children to the expense of his household. There was no savour of fraud about it. It was not sound in law to say that whenever a son or daughter lived in family with his or her father, and took part with him in supporting the household by his or her exertions, a legal claim for payment of these services arose against the father. Such a case was different from those in which a relative was brought in to give his aid.[1] If such were held to be the law immense advantage of it would be taken by relatives of an insolvent to the prejudice of his just creditors. The onus was on the pursuer, being a conjunct person with her father, to prove that the transaction was a bona fide one.[2] That had not been done. Even assuming there was an imperfect obligation on Dawson to remunerate the pursuer, a creditor could not be prejudiced by his determining in such circumstances to fulfil it. The case might be illustrated by a postnuptial contract. A man could lawfully make provisions for wife and children by a postnuptial contract, but not such provisions as to entitle the objects of them to compete with his prior creditors.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The pursuer had an enforceable claim against her father for her many years' service in supporting him, or helping to support him, by acting as a servant in his lodging-house. It was not to be presumed, because she was his daughter, that she intended to give all that labour for nothing.[3] (2) If there was a "just" cause, the transaction would be supported even though the Court would not have sustained action by the pursuer against her father. The words "true, just, and necessarie cause, and without a just price really payed," which were used by the Act 1621, c. 18, were disjunctive, not conjunctive.[4] The case was within the principle of Hodge v. Morrison, relied on by the Sheriff.

At advising,—

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—This case was heard by Lord Young, Lord Craighill, and myself on 12th May last. The question is whether the pursuer, Miss Dawson, is proprietor of certain articles of furniture specified in the prayer for interdict. She claims the property of these articles by virtue of a disposition from her father, dated 6th January 1887. These articles admittedly belonged to her father prior to that date, for she claims the property in them only by virtue of the disposition. The defender also claims these articles by virtue of a poinding of the ground which he has used as an heritable creditor of the father. There is no question that the diligence is sufficient if the father was the proprietor of the articles which it attached. In these circumstances the defender objects to the assignation on which the pursuer founds, on the allegation that it was granted in contravention of the Act 1621, cap. 18. That raises this issue, Whether the disposition was granted without "true, just, and necessary cause"? for it is not disputed that at the date of granting the granter was insolvent, and of course it cannot be disputed that the pursuer was, in relation to her father, a conjunct person. The only remaining question therefore is, whether there was true, just, and necessary cause to sustain this disposition, although it was granted by an insolvent to his daughter.

[4] Grant v. Grant, 1748, M. 952.

The only cause which the pursuer alleges is that her father was her debtor in respect of services rendered. She says that he owed her at least £100 in return for services rendered in keeping his house. I am not going to say that if proved this would not be a perfectly good cause. It is quite possible that for services such as these a daughter may become the creditor of her father, but it must be proved, and considering that the granter was insolvent at the date of granting, and she was conjunct with him, it lies upon the person standing on the deed to prove by sufficient evidence the existence of the true, just, and necessary cause, which alone will sustain it. In this I think the pursuer has entirely failed. She has adduced no evidence except her own. Her father is unfortunately not in a condition to be examined, and it is a great loss to her that his evidence is not available. There is some other evidence which is said to be corroborative of hers, but I think we must lay it aside, and hold that she herself is the only witness in support of her case. I am therefore forced to the conclusion that she has failed to prove the existence of a true, just, and necessary cause for the granting of this deed, and consequently I think that the defender must be assoilzied.

Lord Young.—I have come to the same conclusion, and have not much to add beyond expressing my concurrence in the result at which Lord Rutherfurd Clark has arrived, and my regret in arriving at it. Not that I say that this poinding creditor has acted otherwise than properly—indeed generously, but I am satisfied that this young woman has been of great service to her aged father for some years past, in aiding him to keep lodgers, and so supporting him. But nevertheless I cannot think that the relation of debtor and creditor was thereby established between them. She was a dutiful daughter to him; but I cannot infer from that the relation of debtor and creditor. The case stands thus: the father is absolutely insolvent. He has borrowed £700 from one creditor on the security of his house, and then £125 from another creditor on the same security—of course a postponed bond. The house is brought to sale by the first bondholder, and realises less by £19, 17s. 8d. than the amount of the bond, but the bondholder makes up the difference by bringing a poinding of the ground and claiming the furniture, on which the pursuer pays the £19, 17s. 8d., and takes an assignation to the poinding. But then the creditor for £125 steps in. He, too, proceeds to poind the furniture, and the pursuer now seeks to have him interdicted from selling it under his poinding. It is stated that this proceeding on her part is just so much money thrown away, and I rather think that is so. I think the defender was willing to act honestly, or as I have said even generously by the pursuer, for I find that his agent says this in his evidence,—"In December 1886 I was wishing to compromise this claim of the defender's by any payment which I could get from Dawson's friends, and I believe it might have been settled then for £25 or £30." They would not agree to this, and then the father, not having a shilling in the world, makes a present of his furniture to his daughter. I am not surprised that Mr Thorburn, not getting the £25 which he was willing to take for his £125, should have objected to this, and proceeded to poind the furniture. I think he was entitled to do so, and cannot be stopped.

LORD YOUNG intimated that LORD CRAIGHILL, who was absent through illness, concurred in the judgment.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I did not hear the case I give no opinion.

> THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the pursuer has failed to prove that the disposition granted to her by William Dawson, her father, was granted for a just and necessary cause; Therefore sustain the appeal; recall the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Dismiss the petition," &c.

ROSETTA EDITH BARBER OR STEEL, Defender (Reclaimer).—Sir Charles Pearson—Murray.

Husband and Wife—Divorce for desertion—Jurisdiction—Domicile—Foreign—Anglo-Indian domicile.—A person's domicile of origin must prevail until he has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning it and of acquiring another as his sole domicile.

A Scotsman, born and educated in Scotland, in 1857 went to Rangoon, Burmah, and became a partner of a firm of merchants there. Until 1872 he resided chiefly in Rangoon, but came to Scotland on various occasions on visits of considerable duration. In 1873 he formed in London a branch of a new business which he had started in Rangoon, and lived in London, taking the leading part in the business till 1887. In October 1881 he married and lived with his wife in London till 21st February 1884, when she left his house and refused to return. In 1887 he took a lease of Braco Castle in Scotland and went to reside there. On 17th March 1888 he raised an action of divorce in the Court of Session against his wife on the ground of desertion. The wife having pleaded that the pursuer had lost his Scottish domicile and not reacquired it, and that, therefore, the Court had no jurisdiction, proof was led on the question of domicile. Evidence on which the Court held that the pursuer had not lost his domicile of origin, and that, therefore, the Court had jurisdiction in the cause.

Observations (per Lord President) on Anglo-Indian domicile.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

WILLIAM STRANG STEEL was married to Rosetta Edith Barber in London on 25th October 1881. Two children were born of the marriage, and the spouses lived together as man and wife till 21st February 1884, when Mrs Steel left her husband's house and went to live with an aunt in London. After that date she never returned to her husband's house, and never lived with him.

On 17th March 1888 Mr Steel raised an action of divorce on the ground of desertion against his wife. In the summons Mr Steel was designed as an East India merchant, residing at Braco Castle, Perthshire. He stated that he had repeatedly endeavoured to induce the defender to return to cohabitation with him, but that she had refused to do so.

The following averments by the defender, and answers thereto for the pursuer, were made on record:—(Stat. 1) "The pursuer, after his early youth, resided in Java in the employment of a Mr Martin, and afterwards of the mercantile firm of Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company of Calcutta. In or about 1871 the pursuer came to London, where he entered into a partnership with his brother, James Alison Steel, along with whom he carried on business as an East India merchant in East India Avenue, London, the firm having also a large store at Rangoon, and rice-mills at Rangoon and other places in Burmah. The pursuer still carries on the said business. Up to his taking a lease of Braco Castle, as after mentioned, the pursuer had no connection with Scotland, and he was and is a domiciled Englishman." (Ans. 1) "Denied. Explained that the pursuer was born and educated in Glasgow, where his parents, who were both Scotch, resided; that he entered the office of Martin, Turner, & Company there in 1845, and remained in that office till 1851, when he was transferred to the business house of the said firm in Batavia. In 1856 he returned to Scotland and commenced business in Glasgow. In 1857 he went to Burmah, where in 1859 he became a partner of Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company in Rangoon; he returned to Scotland in 1864, went back to Burmah in 1865, returned home to Glasgow in 1868, and went back to Burmah in 1869, where in 1870 he established his own firm of W. Strang Steel & Company. In the autumn of 1871 he returned again to this country, and resided partly in Glasgow and partly in London, and went back again to Burmah in the spring of 1872. In November 1872 he came to London, and about midsummer of the following year (1873) established a branch of his business in London in partnership with his brother, James Alison Steel. He went out again to Burmah early in 1874, and in the autumn of the same year returned to London." (Stat. 2) "After coming to London, the pursuer lived for some time at Chislehurst and afterwards at No. 65 Lancaster Gate. After that he took No. 88 Lancaster Gate, where he lived with his mother at the time when he first formed the acquaintanceship of the defender. The pursuer and defender, shortly after their marriage, took a journey to India and Burmah, and on their return lived in London and in Brighton. After the pursuer and defender ceased to live together, in February 1884, as hereinafter set forth, he continued to live at No. 88 Lancaster Gate until on or about 28th July 1887, when, for the first time, he went to Scotland, having taken a lease of Braco Castle. The defender's object in going to Scotland was solely in order to give colour to the assertion that he was a domiciled Scotsman, and his residence there is not intended to be permanent, and is merely taken up in order, if possible, to found a jurisdiction against the defender. The defender was born in Demerara, her parents being of Irish origin, and prior to her marriage she lived in London, and never has been subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts. By the law of England, desertion, even if proved, is not a ground of divorce. Prior to their marriage the pursuer and defender entered into a settlement of marriage, which was conceived and executed according to the law of England, and it was understood and agreed by both parties that the matrimonial domicile should be England." (Ans. 2) "Admitted that the pursuer lived occasionally with his brother near Chislehurst in the year 1871. Admitted that after returning from Burmah in the winter of 1872 he again resided (excepting during his absence in Burmah in 1874, and other absences on the Continent and in Scotland) with his brother at 65 Lancaster Gate, London, his mother having also come to live there after the death of his father in the summer of 1872. Admitted that at Christmas 1880 the pursuer rented a house, No. 88 Lancaster Gate, and resided there till his marriage in 1881; that immediately after his marriage he proceeded to Burmah with his wife, returning to London in 1882, where, with the exception of short intervals, he continued to reside till February 1884, when he took a furnished house at Brighton, where he was temporarily residing when deserted by the defender. Admitted that the pursuer thereafter resided in London till May 1887, when he returned to Scotland, having taken a lease of Braco Castle, and with the exception of occasional business visits to London, he has since continued to reside there. The averments as to the defender's birth, parentage, and residence in London are admitted. Admitted that the antenuptial settlement between the parties was in the English form. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the pursuer's residences in England were entirely in connection with his business, and were of a temporary character, and that it has always been his desire and intention to return to his native country, and to settle there permanently, and for a number of years he has been on the outlook for a suitable estate there, intending to purchase it and to make it his permanent abode."

There were also averments on the merits which need not be further referred to.

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender having been guilty of non-adherence to and wilful desertion of the pursuer as her lawful husband, for a continuous period exceeding four years, he is entitled to decree of divorce as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction.

The Lord Ordinary allowed the pursuer a proof of her averments in support of her first plea, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation.

From the evidence led it appeared that Mr Steel was born in 1832 in Glasgow, and was educated there. Both his parents were Scottish, his mother being a daughter of Mr Strang of Westhouse, East Kilbride, whose family had possessed that estate for many years. In 1845 he entered the office of Martin, Turner, & Company, merchants in Glasgow, and remained in Glasgow till 1851, when he was transferred to the firm's house of Martin, Dyce, & Company in Batavia. In 1856 he returned to Glasgow, and set up there in business for himself. In 1857 he went out to Rangoon, Burmah, to manage the business there of Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company, the correspondents of James Finlay & Company, merchants, Glasgow. In 1859 he became a partner of the firm of Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company, and remained in Rangoon till 1864, when he returned to Scotland, and lived in Glasgow with his brother for nearly a year. In 1865 he again went out to Burmah, returned to Glasgow in 1868, and remained there, having his father's house as his head-quarters, till 1869, when he returned to Rangoon. In October 1870 he retired from the firm of Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company, and established his own firm of William Strang Steel & Company in Rangoon. That firm was opened in conjunction with James Finlay & Company of Glasgow, who were the firm's only correspondents in this country. In 1871 he returned to Scotland, he went again to Burmah early in the spring of 1872, and came back to London in the autumn of the same year. In 1873 he established a branch of his Burmese business in London in partnership with his brother, J. A. Steel. In 1874 he went out again to Burmah, and returned late in the same year to London. After his return from Burmah in 1872 he resided when in Europe chiefly with his brother in London, being absent only for short visits to the Continent and to Scotland. In 1880 he took a house of his own in London, still, however, retaining his private house in Rangoon. After he took his house in London his mother and brother (his father being dead) resided with him there.*

* With reference to his various visits to this country prior to 1873 the pursuer stated in cross-examination,—" My visit to Glasgow in 1864 was a visit of health and pleasure, and in order to see my relatives. It had no business character at all. It was expected that when I was in Glasgow on the various

The pursuer was married to the defender on 25th October 1881. Miss Barber was born in Demerara of Irish parents, and was brought up in Ireland. The marriage-contract was prepared and revised in London. The pursuer deponed that he told the defender before the marriage that he was a Scotsman, and had been brought up in Scotland, but this latter statement the defender denied. There was no arrangement come to before the marriage that they should live in England. Immediately after the marriage the pursuer went to Burmah on business, and was accompanied by his wife. The spouses returned to the pursuer's house in Lancaster Gate, London, in 1882. While in Rangoon they resided in the pursuer's house there. The spouses continued to live in London, with the exception of short intervals, till February 1884, when the pursuer took a furnished house at Brighton. On 21st February of that year the defender left the pursuer. The evidence of the pursuer and defender with regard to any expression of intention on the part of the pursuer to make his home in Scotland is given below.*

occasions between 1857 and 1870 I should call upon people with whom we did business. I did not come home for that purpose, but being there I called on various people on business matters. Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company was chiefly a consignment house, but they also purchased rice on commission. On those occasions, between 1857 and 1870, when I was in Glasgow, I always stayed with my relatives. I had one brother in Java and two in Glasgow. . . . . I am still a partner of the firm which I established in 1873. After the establishment of the London branch, the Burmah branch of the business was carried on through managers. From that time my brother and I, as partners, have attended to the business in London, and we assumed other partners in 1874. The first time we had partners in Burmah was when we promoted our managers to be partners about 1881 or 1882."

* The defender deponed,—"During the time from my marriage until February 1884 Mr Steel never communicated to me in any way his intention to live in Scotland, except on one occasion at Brighton, when he brought forward a large map of Scotland and pointed with his finger, and said he was thinking about taking a place there. I don't know where it was. That was the only occasion I ever heard Scotland mentioned. (Q.) Did he use the word 'take'? (A.) I really don't remember the exact words. That was in 1884. On the other hand, he was always saying he was looking out for a place in England to purchase, and he once mentioned a sum of £20,000 that he was thinking of giving for a place. I remember a conversation I had with him in the drawing-room at 88 Lancaster Gate immediately after our engagement. I was looking at a large case of stuffed birds that was standing behind the drawing-room door, and Mr Steel came forward and remarked that it was not the proper place for this case of stuffed birds—that he was looking out for a place in England not far distant from London, and that when he purchased such a place he would have the case removed there. He led me to believe he was making inquiries about various places in England. I did not go with him to any house-agents. I remember one day when we were taking a long drive he pointed out a place in the neighbourhood of Watford, Hertfordshire, and said he was thinking of it. I also heard indirectly from a Miss Andrews that he had mentioned the neighbourhood of Windsor. During my married life all Mr Steel's relations, so far as I was brought into contact with them, were living in London and the neighbourhood of London. He had no near relations that he told me about in Scotland at all. His mother was living, and still lives, with her son James in Cleveland Square, London. On one occasion Mr Steel and I went to Scotland for a few weeks to pay visits. (Q.) Were they relations that you went to, or only friends? (A.) Only friends. During the time we were in Scotland he never said anything to me about considering himself a Scotchman, or that he was going to live in Scotland. (Q.) Mr Steel says in the present case 'that it has always been his desire and intention to return to his native country, and to settle there permanently, and for a number of years he has been on the outlook for a suitable estate there, intending to purchase it and to make it his permanent abode.' Is that the first you ever heard of that? (A.) Yes, I never heard that that was his intention, because he had always been talking about England. I certainly do not believe that during our married life he had the slightest intention of going to Scotland to establish himself permanently there. He never spoke or behaved in any way as if he considered himself a native of Scotland at that time."

In cross-examination,—"(Q.) During your engagement was not Mr Steel a good deal in Scotland? (A.) I did not hear that. I wrote to him there during our engagement. He was paying a few visits in Scotland. I was only once in Scotland in his company during our married life. I think that was in 1883. (Q.) Did he not on that occasion propose to take a house at Braemar for the summer and autumn months? (A.) I never heard it before. (Q.) Did you not object to go there? (A.) I did not. (Q.) And did you not arrange in consequence to go upon a tour of visits with him in Scotland? (A.) I never heard of it. He went and paid some visits, and I went with him. On one occasion only I heard him say something about purchasing an estate in Scotland. (Q.) Do you say positively there was no other occasion? (A.) I do not remember. Mr Muir of Deanston was present on that occasion. (Q.) Was the estate then mentioned the estate of Findynate, in Perthshire? (A.) I never heard the name. (Q.) Did not Mr Steel tell you at that time that he was looking after that place, and thought of buying it as a residence? (A.) I never heard it. (Q.) Were you listening to what he and Mr Muir were saying? (A.) Mr Muir and he were not conversing—it was merely a few words, and I did not hear the name of the place in Scotland; at that time we were living on such terms that we were really not speaking to each other. (Q.) When your husband spoke of taking a place in England, were these places all near London? (A.) They were to be within easy reach of London. (Q.) So that he could go back and forward to his business? (A.) He did not say to his business; he said he would go back and forward to Lancaster Gate. I heard he had had a place for pheasant shooting near London, before our marriage. (Q.) Can you say whether the conversations to which you have referred had reference to similar places? (A.) I understood he was going to purchase a place of his own."

Miss Andrews, a witness for the defender, deponed that Mr Steel told her in February 1884 that he "had either taken or was in treaty for one of the handsomest places in England," near London, she thought.

The pursuer deponed,—"The acquisition of an estate in Scotland has been for a very long time the object of my desire, and both before and after my marriage I had considered the particulars of various estates in Scotland which were brought under my notice. As far back as 1864 I had endeavoured to repurchase my mother's family estate, and more than once since then I have renewed the attempt, but the present proprietor will not part with it. Among the other places which have been brought under my notice are Roseneath Castle, Airthrey, Coldoch, and Findynate. I remember, while we were at Brighton, and before my wife left me, having a conversation with her about the estate of Findynate. At the time I found it necessary to get out of London I had written Mr Muir rather pressingly to see if there was any nice place in Perthshire likely to be immediately available, and he sent me the particulars of an estate there belonging to a Mr Walker. I considered the matter, but I wanted to have an opportunity of speaking to my wife on the subject before saying anything positive. She was in such a temper at the time that I could get no opportunity of speaking to her in a reasonable way till Mr Muir arrived at Brighton on a visit to us. He introduced the subject, and said, 'What do you say to Findynate?' I said, 'Well, I have not had the chance of speaking to my wife about it, but I will get the particulars and shew them to her now.' I got the particulars, shewed them to her, got hold of a map to shew the various Perthshire, which he had taken in February in that year on a lease for five years, with a break in his favour on three months' notice at the end of each year. The evidence of the pursuer with reference to the intention with which he came to Scotland in 1887, both as regards his animus remanendi and his wish to procure a divorce on the ground of desertion, is given below.* At the date of this action the pursuer had let his house places it would be near, and asked her to give me her opinion of that place for a residence. Her reply was,—'Where would my aunt stay?' I said, 'Let us first get a place that suits ourselves, and we shall consider your aunt afterwards.' I pointed out where the place was, and shewed her the stations we would be near. I asked her for an opinion, and she said she would give no opinion; she took no interest in me or my estates, or anything else belonging to me. The matter then dropped. I never considered that I had ceased to be a Scotchman. I was rather proud of being a Scotchman. Nearly all the visitors to my house were Scotch. Scotchmen were continually in and about my house, and Scotland was continually being talked of. I had no intention of settling permanently in England—not longer than my business required me to reside there. I had all along the prospect of getting my business into such a position that I would not require to supervise it. I had always the intention of ultimately settling in Scotland as soon as business arrangements permitted. That was my intention both before and after my marriage. Naturally it would only be to my very intimate friends that I would mention that, but it was spoken of in the family circle and amongst my intimate friends."

In cross-examination,—"(Q.) Had you made inquiries in London during your married life as to purchasing or taking an estate? (A.) I had the matter in view even before my marriage. I cannot recollect making any special inquiries in London. (Q.) Did you ever make any inquiries in Scotland prior to October 1884? (A.) Except as regards the family property at East Kilbride, I was never close enough to the period when I could see my way to leaving London to enter into very close negotiations. The East Kilbride matter was in 1864 and subsequently. I cannot say whether or not it was resumed during my marriage. Prior to 1884 there was one estate which I thought would be in the market, and which I had information about from one of my managers. That was the estate of Ardmillan, near Girvan. That was about 1879. . . . Apart from the matter of my mother's family property, I cannot fix any particular date when my aspiration to have a place in Scotland first took shape. It is an aspiration which I have had from the time I have seen any prospect of being able to afford it. My mother's family property is a very small property at East Kilbride, with a small residence on it. I don't know the acreage—it may be from 150 to 200 acres."

The evidence of intention to settle in Scotland or take a Scottish place was corroborated by various witnesses.

* "I have at present no intention of leaving Braco. I am settled in Scotland with the firm intention of never leaving it. I think I am not at all likely to leave Braco except for a place of my own in Scotland. I am still looking after an estate to purchase. I have no thought or intention whatever of returning to live in London. There is nothing in connection with my family or business arrangements which renders that necessary, so far as I know. . . . After my wife left me, the matter of settlement in Scotland came up more prominently. I made up my mind to move to Scotland as soon as a suitable place offered. I knew that according to Scotch law I was entitled to divorce for desertion. (Q.) May I take it you also knew or had learned that resumption of residence in Scotland might be of importance or might be useful in enforcing that remedy? (A.) Well, I felt it would at all events put aside any suggestion that my residence away from Scotland had at all prejudiced my position as a Scotchman. The condition of my business at the time and other circumstances tended to the same result. My business was in a groove, and my younger partners had gained experience and accumulated money, and I felt quite safe in leaving them. I had also a strong hope that my wife might come back to me, and I thought that in Rangoon. He was still, however, a member of both the Rangoon and London firms, though he left the management entirely to his partners.

On 26th June 1888, the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having taken the proof allowed by the interlocutor of 15th June current, and heard counsel, finds that the domicile of the pursuer is in Scotland: Therefore repels the first plea in law stated for the defender, and sustains the jurisdiction of the Court; and on the merits allows to the parties a proof of their averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation." *

if she did come back, having our home in Scotland might simplify matters, because I thought she would be away from the influences which had in my view caused the disagreement. Having all these things in view, I proceeded to look about for a suitable estate or residence in Scotland."

In cross-examination,—"He (Mr Graham, Glasgow) knew my views generally—that I wished to have a property in Scotland—and when I saw him from time to time we discussed properties. He never took any decided step to bring about business until 1887. I have no doubt that I consulted him generally in 1884 on the state of my relations with my wife. After she left my roof, Mr Graham strongly advised me not to consent to any deed of separation, as it would interfere with my getting a divorce, which I might have to go for if the separation continued. Now that it is put to me, I do not think there was anything said about a divorce; Mr Graham's anxiety was to bring about proper relations. (Q.) Did you get up the law of Scotland on the subject of divorce for desertion yourself, independently? (A.) I was not thinking of divorce at that time. (Q.) But did you get up the subject of the law of Scotland on the subject of divorce independently? (A.) From time to time when in Scotland no doubt I had conversations with Mr Graham on the subject. I believe Mr Graham did shew me a book on the subject. There was nothing about coming to live in Scotland with reference to improving my chances. That was in my own mind. (Q.) How did you come to the knowledge that that was important with reference to getting a divorce? (A.) I never thought it was important. No doubt it was in my mind by way of stopping any suggestion about my not being a Scotchman on account of my residence away from Scotland. (Q.) Was it your own discovery, or Mr Graham's suggestion, that you had been so much away from Scotland that it was desirable, in order to stop doubts on the subject, that you should come to reside here now? (A.) I had always intended to come and reside in Scotland, and the prospect of these proceedings may have accelerated the carrying out of that intention. (Q.) But you cannot say whether it was your own discovery or Mr Graham's suggestion? (A.) I cannot say. The subject was no doubt discussed between Mr Graham and myself."

* "OPINION.—I do not think it necessary in this case to call for a reply from the counsel for the pursuer, as I am satisfied, upon the proof which has been led, that the domicile of the pursuer is in Scotland, and was so at the time he raised this action. We start with the fact that the domicile of origin was in Scotland. The bearing of this fact on the question now to be answered is very important. Lord Chancellor Cottenham, in the case of Munro v. Munro (10th August 1840, 1 Rob. App. 606), expressed his opinion as follows:—'Questions of domicile are frequently attended with great difficulty; and as the circumstances which give rise to such questions are necessarily very various, it is of the utmost importance not to depart from any principles which have been established relative to such questions, particularly if such principles be adopted, not only by the laws of England, but generally by the laws of other countries. It is, I conceive, one of those principles, that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile, and acquiring another as his sole domicile. Such, after the fullest consideration of the authorities, was the principle laid down by Lord Alvanley in Sommerville v. Sommerville (5 Ves. 787), and from which I see no reason for dissenting. So firmly indeed did the civil law consider the domicile of origin to adhere, that it holds that if it be actually abandoned, and a new domicile acquired, but that again abandoned, and no new one acquired in its place, the domicile of origin revives. To effect this abandonment of the domicile of origin and substitute another in its place, it required "le concours de la volonté et du fait," "animo et facto"; that is by actual residence in the place, with the intention that the place then chosen should be the principal and permanent residence, "larum rerumque ac fortunarum suarum." There must be residence and intention; residence alone has no effect per se, although it may be most important as a ground from which to infer intention. Mr Burge in his excellent work (1 Burge, For. and Col. Law, 54), cites many authorities from the civilians to establish this proposition. "It is not," he says, "by purchasing and occupying a house, or furnishing it, or vesting a part of his capital there, nor by residence alone, but it must be residence with the intention that it should be permanent."'

"In like manner Lord Cairns thus expressed himself on the point:—'The onus lies upon those who desire to shew that there was a change in this domicile, by which I mean the personal status indicated by that word,—the onus, I say, lies upon those who assert that the personal status thus acquired, and continued from the time of his birth, was changed, to prove that that change took place. The law is beyond all doubt clear, with regard to the domicile of birth, that the personal status indicated by that term clings and adheres to the subject of it, until an actual change is made by which the personal status of another domicile is acquired' (Bell v. Kennedy, L. R., 1 Sc. App. 310, 6 Macp. (H. L.) 69). The onus therefore is upon the defender in this action to shew that the domicile of origin was changed, and in regard to change of domicile it must be kept in mind, as the authorities I have quoted shew, that it is not effected by the mere fact of residence, however long continued, without the animus or purpose of permanent domiciliation and adoption of the laws of the new domicile. Much more where the question is whether a man has changed his domicile, abandoning that which he held from his birth, must there be proof not only of the fact of residence elsewhere for a time, but of an intention to constitute a new domicile in exclusion of the old.

"Now, I can find no proof that the pursuer of this action, while he was attempting to establish a business in Rangoon, had any intention whatever of becoming a domiciled Burmese. He travelled during the years before his marriage between Rangoon and London and Scotland, all in the way of business. His whole plan of life, as regards his domicile, was unsettled; and until the marriage in 1881, I am of opinion that there is no ground for saying that he had changed his domicile of origin.

"Did he then do it in 1881? He lived with his wife most unhappily—according to the account of both parties—from 1881 to 1884 in London and at Brighton. His business was in London and at Rangoon. He required to attend to his business at London, but this was not enough to effect a change of domicile according to Lord Cottenham; and I refrain from expressing any opinion as to whether or not a domicile different from that of origin was adopted when the pursuer and his wife took up house at Lancaster Gate, London, in 1881. I will assume, for the purpose of this case, that such a domicile was acquired; and then comes the question whether the domicile of origin was revived by what took place at Whitsunday 1887. Upon this point I have no doubt whatever. It is clearly proved by the evidence of the pursuer's friends—acquainted with him from childhood—that he had always looked forward to settling in his own country of Scotland when he had made a fortune. It was the theme of constant talk among them, and it is proved beyond all controversy that he had been, long before the unhappy separation between him and his wife, looking out for an estate in Scotland. He was unable to get himself suited in regard to the purchase of such an estate; but at Whitsunday 1887 he obtained a lease for a term of years of Braco Castle in Perthshire, to which he transferred the whole of his household, and such of his furniture as he did not give to his brother James. He depones that he did this with the view of permanently settling in Scotland, and making it his home, and I entirely believe this statement; and this is quite sufficient to constitute him a domiciled Scotsman. In regard to the revival of the domicile of origin the case of Udny v. Udny (3d June 1869, 7 Macp. (H. L.) 89), shews that this takes place upon the mere abandonment of a domicile of choice, without the acquisition of another domicile of choice. And Lord Stowell says, in regard to this matter, that, 'it is always to be remembered that the native character easily reverts, and that it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicile in the case of a native subject, than to impress the national character on one who is originally of another country.'—(The Harmony, 2 Rob. Ad. 322.)

"But there has been mixed up with this question as to domicile another question with which it has no connection. It is said, in the first place, that the pursuer in coming to Scotland did so with the purpose of acquiring a domicile, in order to give the Scottish Courts jurisdiction in an action of divorce by him against his wife. Secondly, it is said that his object in coming to Scotland was to obtain the advantage or benefit of the Scotch law, which enables a deserted spouse to obtain divorce after four years, which four years' desertion, it is said, must take place in Scotland, and not in a foreign country. These two points were settled—so far as they can be in an undefended action—in the case of Carswell v. Carswell (6th July 1881, 8 Ret. 901). But as it is stated by the defender that she means to contest the soundness of that judgment, I may here explain, in a few words, the grounds on which I entirely concur in it.

"I have often had occasion to consider these two questions. First, the motive of the pursuer in coming to Scotland is, in my opinion, totally irrelevant. The husband is the master of the situation. He can determine the domicile of the spouses, and according to that domicile the rights of the spouses must be settled. He can, for example, change the domicile from Scotland to England, and, if he does so, the wife is without jus relictæ at his death. He is entitled in like manner to change the domicile to a country whose laws give him privileges and advantages that he does not enjoy under the law of the country where the spouses may be at the time resident. He exercises only a legal right when he comes to Scotland and there appeals to the law of that country for redress against a conjugal wrong. When he comes to Scotland he is subjected to all the restraints imposed by the laws of this country upon individuals, and in like manner he is entitled to all its privileges, among which one of these is the right of divorce against a deserting wife.

"Then, on the other hand, the plea that the desertion must have taken place in Scotland has always appeared to me to be one of the most untenable that could be stated against the operation of a most beneficial law. The conjugal wrong which the Statute of 1573 was intended to repress was not a wrong committed merely in Scotland, but anywhere. It is the law of all countries, and it is the obligation undertaken by the matrimonial vow at marriage, that the wife shall adhere to the husband, and whether the non-adherence be committed in America, or Africa, or elsewhere out of Scotland, yet if it is committed, a Scotsman domiciled in Scotland is entitled to found upon this violation of the matrimonial vows as a ground for divorce, in like manner as he would be entitled to found upon an adultery committed at the Cape of Good Hope or Rangoon by the wife.

"The defender may put an end to this action at any time she pleases. She has only to do what she promised at her marriage and what the law requires of her. The pursuer stated when examined as a witness that he is willing to receive her, and that he is anxious that she should return to cohabitation. Apparently she is still under the same malign influence that caused the estrangement originally, and will not fulfil the duty which the law declares to be incumbent upon her of adhering to her husband. The husband cannot obtain from any Court of

Steel v. Steel.

In 1857 the respondent had gone to Rangoon, had become in 1859 the partner of a firm whose principal place of business was in England, in 1870 had established a business of his own in Rangoon, and had resided abroad almost continuously until 1873. The few visits which he paid to Scotland during this period were visits purely of pleasure. His business tied him to Burmah, and residence abroad as a merchant, with the intention of remaining until a fortune should be made, and then returning in the evening of life, was sufficient to give a man a domicile in the foreign country.[1] Moreover, the respondent's intention to return was at best vague and inchoate, and such an intention was not to outweigh all the acts of his life.[2] His residence abroad indicated a settlement for an indefinite period, and it was just such a settlement that gave an Anglo-Indian domicile.[3]

With regard to the period subsequent to 1873, there was no room for saying that the domicile of origin revived on the respondent's coming to England, even if it could be shewn that another domicile in England arose at once. In 1873 he established a branch of his business in London, and in 1874 he came to reside there permanently, living at his brother's house. His mother and near relatives were all now settled in London. Each successive act of his life hereafter served to establish him more securely in London. In 1880 he hired a house on a long lease, in 1881 he married in London, and thus larem constituit, and his marriage settlement was English. The only connection that the respondent had with Scotland was that he had been born there, and a not unnatural feeling of pride in this fact was the key to all his conversations and expressions regarding Scotland.

The next question was, Did the respondent's domicile of origin revive on his return to Scotland in 1887? His motive in coming was this action of divorce, and although motive on the authorities[4] was not to be considered if the intention to settle in Scotland were bona fide, it should be considered for the purpose of testing the intention. The character of the residence in Scotland must also be regarded. Now, the respondent only held Braco on a lease of five years with yearly breaks in it, and the ties which bound him to London were not entirely severed. But even if the respondent's domicile of origin had revived in 1887 two questions with law in Scotland an order directing her to resume cohabitation to be followed up by arrest as was formerly the custom in England if the order were disobeyed. The obligation of adherence is punished not by enforcing it but by dissolving it. There are, however, certain inconveniences which the defender ought to contemplate before continuing to persist in her present resolution. A wife who deserts her husband is in general not entitled to the custody of the children of the marriage, and she has the custody of one of them at present; and she can claim no separate maintenance from her husband; and the legal rights in the husband's property which the law confers upon a widow will be denied her; and although she is defender in an action of divorce, yet looking to the peculiar character of this action, and the offer made by the husband to receive her back to his society, the right which the wife has of conducting her defence at the husband's expense may not be held here to exist. All these matters should be kept in mind by this defender."

regard to the relevancy of this action presented themselves. In the first place, did the revival of the respondent's Scottish domicile entail a corresponding change of domicile on the part of his wife. The rule that the wife's domicile followed that of the husband was not invariable,[1] and although in the present case the Scottish Courts might have jurisdiction over him, it did not necessarily follow that they had jurisdiction over her. In the second place, even assuming that the domicile of both parties was changed by the pursuer's coming to Scotland in 1887, if the matrimonial domicile was English in 1881, and the contract was English, the reclaimer should not be subjected to penalties unknown to English law, which she could not be supposed to have contemplated at the time of marriage.[2] The alleged desertion was not a Scottish desertion, it had not continued for four years since the revival of the Scottish domicile, and the grounds of action having risen entirely in England, the rights and liabilities of parties must be regulated by English law.[3]

Argued for the respondent;—Mr Steel's domicile in 1857 was unquestionably Scottish, and that threw the entire onus upon those who asserted that there had been a subsequent change. Not only must change of residence be established,[4] but the reclaimer must shew that the domicile of origin had been abandoned, and more than this, that a new domicile had been deliberately acquired.[5] The respondent's residence in Burmah was temporary, and only extended over fifteen years, during which period he paid no less than three visits home. The facts in favour of the original domicile being retained were much stronger than those in Jopp v. Wood. A broad distinction was to be drawn between persons holding appointments in India which required them to reside there and private merchants; the former acquired an Anglo-Indian domicile, the latter did not.[6] The intention to return home ultimately was always present to the respondent, and took definite shape in the year 1864, when he made inquiries with a view to repurchasing the estate which had belonged to his mother's family.

In 1873 he established a branch of his business in London, but in his evidence he explained that London was the centre of the rice market, and his subsequent residence in London was necessitated simply by business, and fell therefore within the same category as the residence in Jopp v. Wood. Until Christmas 1880 he lived in his brother's house in London, and the mere fact of his hiring a house of his own at that date did not per se entail change of domicile.[7] There was the clearest evidence that during his residence in London he had always spoken of himself as a Scotsman, and of Scotland as his ultimate home, and on several occasions had made inquiries about estates in Scotland with a view to purchase.

These intentions were realised in 1887 when he came to Braco Castle, Perthshire. His motive in coming was well explained in his evidence. He came to Scotland partly to put aside any suggestion that his absence had at all prejudiced his position as a Scotsman, partly in the hopes of inducing his wife to follow him. There could be no doubt that he intended to remain; his business could now be entrusted to junior partners; his whole London establishment had been removed to Scotland; and his residence there was just the fulfilment of his lifelong intention. Even if his domicile of origin had been lost it was clear that it was regained in 1887, and such being the case the domicile of the reclaimer changed simultaneously, for the domicile of the husband was the domicile of the wife,[1] and the present case was quite distinct from the cases of Shields, Jack, and Pitt, where no obligation lay upon the wife to follow her husband.

With regard to the reclaimer's last argument, the law of the bona fide domicile was to be looked to without any reference to the law of the place of the marriage, or of the place where the offence for which divorce was craved was committed.[2] There was no authority for saying that the desertion must be desertion for four years by a person whose domicile was Scottish during the whole of that period; the authority of Carswell was against that view. When an act was regarded as a wrong, both in England and Scotland, but there was a different remedy in either country, the lex fori determined the remedy,[3] and the question whether there was a wrong must be judged by the law of the country where the action was raised.[4]

At the hearing in the Inner-House the defender added the following pleas in law:—(2) The pursuer's averments are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) In the circumstances condescended on the pursuer lost his domicile of origin, and the said domicile has never revived. (4) Even assuming the pursuer's domicile to be now in Scotland it has not, at least in the circumstances of this case, the effect of giving jurisdiction for divorce on grounds not admitted by English law. (5) Separatim, the alleged desertion not having continued for four years after such revival, the same is not sufficient to warrant decree under the statute.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer, Mr Steel, brings this action of divorce against his wife upon the ground of desertion, and he is met with the plea of no jurisdiction, which is founded upon the allegation in point of fact that he is not a domiciled Scotchman. The Lord Ordinary has repelled the plea, and sustained the jurisdiction of the Court upon a finding that the domicile of the pursuer is in Scotland. But the defender, since the case came before us, has added other pleas which might have raised in certain circumstances important questions of law. She has maintained, among other things, "that, in the circumstances condescended on, the pursuer lost his domicile of origin, and the said domicile has never revived"; and another plea is,—"Even assuming the pursuer's domicile to be now in Scotland, it has not, at least in the circumstances of this case, the effect of giving jurisdiction for divorce on grounds not admitted by English law." And further, she maintains that "the alleged desertion not having continued for four years after such revival"—that is, of the domicile—"the same is not sufficient to warrant decree under the statute," —meaning the Statute 1573.

Now, according to the view which I take of this case, it is not necessary to consider or determine the questions raised by these additional pleas, because I am of opinion that Mr Steel is not only a domiciled Scotchman, but that he never was anything else—he never lost his domicile of origin; and I think the arguments for the defender have really proceeded very much upon a misapprehension, or at least a misstatement of the true nature and effect of a domicile of origin. It is by no means an easy thing to establish that a man has lost his domicile of origin, for, as Lord Cranworth said in the case of Moorhouse v. Lord,—"In order to acquire a new domicile a man must intend quatenus in illo exuere patriam," and I venture to translate these words into English as meaning that he must have a fixed intention or determination to strip himself of his nationality, or in other words to renounce his birthright in the place of his original domicile. The serious character of such a change is very well expounded by Lord Curriehill in the case of Donaldson v. M'Clure. He says,—"To abandon one domicile for another means something far more than a mere change of residence. It imports an intention not only to relinquish those peculiar rights, privileges, and immunities which the law and constitution of the domicile confer on the denizens of the country in their domestic relations, in their business transactions, in their political and municipal status, and in the daily affairs of common life, but also the laws by which the succession to property is regulated after death. The abandonment or change of a domicile is therefore a proceeding of a very serious nature, and an intention to make such an abandonment requires to be proved by satisfactory evidence." Perhaps that last sentence might have been more strongly expressed, because there must be not only an intention to change, but that intention must be carried into execution. For, as Lord Cottenham said in Munro v. Munro,—"The domicile of origin must prevail until he has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile and acquiring another as his sole domicile." There is one other point very well settled in the law of domicile, and which is expressed very distinctly and clearly by Lord Wensleydale in the case of Aikman v. Aikman, where he says,—"Every man's domicile of origin must be presumed to continue until he has acquired another sole domicile by actual residence, with the intention of abandoning the domicile of origin. The change must be animo et facto, and the burden of proof unquestionably lies upon the party who asserts that change." And the same doctrine as regards the onus of proof is laid down by Lord Chancellor Cairns in Kennedy v. Bell.

These are very well fixed principles now in the law of domicile, and I say no more about them; but their application here, I think, is obvious and very important. The defender undertakes by this plea of no jurisdiction to establish as matter of fact that her husband has lost his domicile of origin. Now, how has she acquitted herself of that undertaking? The proof upon the defender's part consists of her own statement upon oath, and really of nothing more. There are one or two other witnesses called who contribute nothing to the case at all; and her own statement is of the vaguest and most untrustworthy kind. She states as a sort of general impression that during her married life, or one may say after her first acquaintance with her husband, she had no particular reason to suppose that he was a domiciled Scotchman. She met him in London, and married him there. But when she is asked very special questions as to sentiments that he expressed, and plans that he proposed to her regarding their married life, and regarding a return to Scotland, she falls back entirely on non memini, and there is nothing to be had from her at all upon that subject. On the other hand, let us see how the case stands. The first time that the pursuer went from home he went to Java, and the next time he went from home he went to Rangoon—to Burmah; and it was seriously maintained that this born Scotchman made a determination to make himself a domiciled Burmese. It is very difficult to realise what that means; but that any domiciled Scotchman in his senses should come to a determination to live the rest of his life in Burmah is an idea that I cannot bring myself to entertain at all. Nobody goes to Burmah to remain. Nobody in his senses ever goes to Burmah sine animo revertendi, and it is really idle to discuss that part of the case. There is no basis or foundation for it at all. He went there in prosecution of his business as a trader. He went there to make his fortune as far as he could, and he continued there for a long time in pursuit of fortune, and at last succeeded. But the idea of its ever entering into his mind that when he had realised his fortune, and made as much in Burmah as he could, he was going to spend the rest of his life there is entirely out of the question.

Something was said about an Anglo-Indian domicile. Now, the notion of an Anglo-Indian domicile has no application in this kind of case at all. Why an Anglo-Indian domicile should be suggested for a Scotchman I do not know. I think with Lord Cranworth that it would be a Scoto-Indian domicile. But let that pass. An Anglo-Indian domicile or a Scoto-Indian domicile applies only to persons who go out to India in the service of the East India Company as it was formerly, or in the service of the Indian Government as the matter stands now, and it is so because the nature of the employment which these parties have accepted makes it their duty to reside permanently in India. But that does not apply in the slightest degree to a trader. He does not go to Burmah because his duty requires him to reside there. The pursuer here went to Burmah for the sake of trading, just as he went to Java before, and as he went to many other places probably in the course of his life. He went there not as a resident, not as a citizen of the country, but as a foreign trader. So that the idea of a domicile acquired in that way must be at once dismissed.

But, then, no doubt it is alleged, and there is at first sight more specious ground for that contention, that after the pursuer came home from Burmah he settled in London, and thus became a domiciled Englishman. Now, the reason of his going to live in London is very well explained by himself. When he went to live in London he certainly did not cease to be a trader, or give up his trade with Burmah. On the contrary, it was in prosecution of that very trade that he was led to live in London. He says,—"At 31st October 1870 I retired from Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company, and established my own firm of William Strang Steel & Company. James Finlay & Company were at the beginning, and for some years, the only representatives we had in this country, and it was in conjunction with them that our business in Rangoon was opened." James Finlay & Company were a Glasgow house. "That arrangement continued till the middle of 1873, when I found it necessary to make an alteration upon it. Our rice business had largely developed, and we had erected large rice mills; and while James Finlay & Company were excellent people for the soft goods department of our business, we required to have an establishment in London to get orders for rice, charter ships, and do matters which James Finlay & Company could not do so well as I could do myself. London is the centre of the rice market. I established a branch of my business in London." Thus it appears very clearly that his transactions at home during his trading with Burmah while in the house of Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company were all through a Glasgow house, and not through any English connection at all; and the only reason why he gave up his old friends in Glasgow as his proper agents and correspondents in this country was the reason which he has explained, that London was the place for a rice business, and that James Finlay & Company could not possibly carry on that for him. Therefore it was that he established a branch of his business in London. He had one branch in Rangoon and another branch in London, and I do not think that the establishment of a branch of his business in London affected his position as a domiciled Scotchman any more than the establishment of a branch in Burmah. He goes to live there in consequence of his having this branch in London; but it is quite plain throughout the whole of his evidence that he looks forward from the very beginning of this London connection to a time when he will be enabled to retire from the active superintendence of that business. He takes two of his brothers into partnership, and some other young men, and as they go on gathering experience and acquiring a larger and larger interest in the house, they take more of the management of the business upon them, until at length they are so completely initiated into the whole details of it, and so able to carry it on by themselves, that Mr Steel comes to the resolution to give up the active superintendence of it altogether. That is not a new idea. It is an idea that had been present to his mind throughout his whole life after he established this branch in London; and he is looking forward to it anxiously so as to enable him, as he himself explains, to return to Scotland and buy land there, or settle there. The necessity for his being in London came to an end, as he himself expresses it in his evidence. After mentioning that he had pointed out a place to his wife where he thought he might be comfortably settled in Scotland, and shewn her on a map where it was, he goes on to say,—"I asked her for an opinion, and she said she would give no opinion; she took no interest in me or my estates, or anything else belonging to me. The matter then dropped. I never considered that I had ceased to be a Scotchman. I was rather proud of being a Scotchman. Nearly all the visitors to my house were Scotch. Scotchmen were continually in and about my house, and Scotland was continually being talked of. I had no intention of settling permanently in England—not longer than my business required me to reside there. I had all along the prospect of getting my business into such a position that I would not require to supervise it. I had always the intention of ultimately settling in Scotland as soon as business arrangements permitted. That was my intention both before and after my marriage. Naturally it would only be to my very intimate friends that I would mention that, but it was spoken of in the family circle, and amongst my intimate friends. After my wife left me, the matter of settlement in Scotland came up more prominently." It was about the beginning of the year 1887 that he at last found himself in a position to leave London altogether, and entrust the management of the branch of the business there to the younger partners. And accordingly he came down and set up his establishment at Braco Castle. But in the meantime, and before that had been done, he had been looking for an estate to buy in Scotland. There were several places brought up for his notice, and he took a great deal of interest in the matter, and made a great many inquiries respecting them. And besides all that, there was one angulus terræ for which he had a great affection, and that was the small remainder of the family estate of his mother, which he was determined to buy from the beginning. He had it in view all his life. Now, really in these circumstances, if we can believe the statements of this gentleman, and I must say his evidence seems to be given with great frankness and candour, and seems to have impressed the Lord Ordinary in the same way,—I think if we can believe his statements, there never was a clearer case of retention of the domicile of origin. I have said already that there is no discharge of the onus lying upon the defender, for she has proved absolutely nothing, and all the statements of the pursuer are consistent with the view that he never for a moment intended to abandon his domicile of origin.

It is a small circumstance, but still it might have been made something of, if his wife had been at the date of the marriage a domiciled Englishwoman; but she was nothing of the kind. She was born at Demerara, and she was of Irish extraction, so that there was not even that slight link to London or England.

On the whole matter, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that this gentleman is giving a fair and true account of the adventures of his life, and I must add that there is some very material corroboration by other witnesses of the statements that he makes. On the whole matter, I must say that I do not think I ever saw a clearer case of a continuing domicile of origin during the whole period of the pursuer's life.

LORD MURE.—I concur in the result that your Lordship has arrived at. In the course of your opinion your Lordship has referred to the judgment of Lord Cottenham in the case of Munro, and it has always appeared to me that in that case we have perhaps the most clear and distinct exposition of the law of Scotland upon this question of domicile. In 1 Robinson, 606, I find the passage your Lordship has referred to, and after the words which your Lordship quoted, Lord Cottenham goes on to say that he conceived "that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile and acquiring another as his sole domicile. Such, after the fullest consideration of the authorities, was the principle laid down by Lord Alvanley in Sommerville v. Sommerville, and from which I see no reason for dissenting. So firmly indeed did the civil law consider the domicile of origin to adhere, that it holds that if it be actually abandoned, and a new domicile acquired, but that again abandoned, and no new one acquired in its place, the domicile of origin revives. To effect this abandonment of the domicile of origin, and substitute another in its place, it required 'le concours de la volonté et du fait,' 'animo et facto'; that is by actual residence in the place, with the intention that the place then chosen should be the principal and permanent residence, 'larum rerumque ac fortunarum suarum.' There must be residence and intention. Residence alone has no effect per se, although it may be most important as a ground from which to infer intention. Mr Burge, in his excellent work, cites many authorities from the civilians to establish this proposition. 'It is not,' he says 'by purchasing and occupying a house or furnishing it, or vesting a part of his capital there, nor by

No. 165. residence alone, but it must be residence with the intention that it should be permanent.'"

Steel v. Steel.

Now, that being, as I apprehend, the law in questions of this description, when I turn to the evidence I am quite unable to come to any other conclusion than that which your Lordship has expressed. Mr Steel goes out to Burmah, and his firm is trading there even to this day, but he never, so far as I see, selected Burmah as a permanent residence; and it would be rather absurd to suppose that he did. But after the period when he first became connected with Gladstone, Wyllie, & Company's house, he returns to Scotland four times from Burmah before he establishes the branch house in London, and on these occasions he goes and resides with his relatives in Glasgow. He does that in 1864, and he goes out and returns in 1865 to Scotland. He goes out again to Burmah shortly after that, and he returns to Glasgow in 1868. He remains there for a certain time, and goes out to Burmah, but he returns again to Glasgow, so long as his father lives. Then after the establishment of the branch house in London, he still goes out to Burmah occasionally on business, but he returns to London, and lives with his relations there. Up to 1874, which is about twenty years after he establishes his business in Burmah, he goes backwards and forwards between that place and London, and never suggests any intention of permanently residing there. As regards the residence in London, he at first, after establishing the business as he explains, resided sometimes with one relation and sometimes with another. He takes the lease of a house, and about the period of his marriage he buys a house there. I agree with your Lordship that he seems to have given his evidence with great candour, and I think his evidence distinctly shews that during the whole period of time that he was engaged in business, what he ultimately looked to was settling in Scotland, and it is in evidence not only that he himself looked about for estates in Scotland some years before 1887, after he had put his firm in London in such a position as would enable him to settle there, but he is confirmed in that by his brother Mr James Steel, and also by Mr John Muir, a partner of Finlay & Company, and by Mr M'Gregor, all of whom speak to what they heard him say, and Mr M'Gregor in particular says:—"I always understood that when he retired partially from business he would reside in Scotland." In these circumstances, I find that there is not only no evidence of intention to give up his domicile of origin, but that there is distinct evidence by the pursuer himself, and his brother and his friends, that he intended, when he had the means of doing so, to settle in Scotland. I therefore agree with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

Lord Shand.—In the very numerous cases that have occurred over a period of many years regarding questions of domicile, I think the principles upon which a question of this kind must be settled have been frequently and very clearly stated, and I do not mean to say anything upon that subject except this, that it is clear that the domicile of origin must be proved to have been abandoned in the first place, and another domicile chosen by the person whose domicile is in question. And the question here for consideration is, has it been proved by the defender that there ever was an abandonment of the Scottish domicile, and a choice of a domicile in England as the sole domicile of Mr Steel?

I am of opinion with your Lordship that there is an entire failure to prove the intention either to abandon the Scottish domicile or to adopt a new one. So far as regards the residence in Rangoon, I entirely agree with all that your Lordships have said. There is every probability against a man selecting Rangoon for the purpose not merely of prosecuting his business, but of adopting it as his home, in which he means to live and die. I should say it would be almost impossible to point to anyone who had ever done so. At least if such a man could be found, it might be certainly predicated of him that he was singular in his tastes, and very eccentric. Looking to the evidence, I think it is perfectly clear that Mr Steel's residence at Rangoon was temporary, and for a temporary purpose; and I do not think that the argument which was submitted with reference to the acquisition of a domicile there is worthy of serious consideration.

The only question in the case is whether something stronger cannot be said for a domicile in England, in consequence of his residence in London; and there I think there was room for argument, although I think the argument clearly fails. There is, of course, more probability in favour of a man choosing London or England as his permanent home, in the view that he is never again to return to Scotland, so that he abandons his home in Scotland, and the question is whether, upon the evidence here, we have proof that that was the state of facts as regards Mr Steel. He lived there a considerable time. He took the lease of a house for seven, fourteen, and twenty-one years in London; he was married in London, and no doubt appeared to have settled there. But along with these facts we must take the body of evidence which we have in regard to the state of his mind during all this time. As your Lordship has pointed out, the purpose of his going to London is obvious, viz., the prosecution of his business—the connection with Rangoon being still kept up. We have, however, in regard to intention, the clearest possible evidence from Mr Steel himself. That evidence seems to me to put the case beyond any question. As I said in the course of the discussion, if this question of domicile had arisen upon a question of succession, Mr Steel having died while still living in London, the Court might have been deprived of a good deal of light in the evidence which Mr Steel has himself given, and might have been driven to decide this question of jurisdiction upon imperfect evidence, the proof of animus being only supplied from conversations that he had had with his friends, and the intention he had then expressed. Even then I should have said that upon the proof, as we have it, there is evidence through his friends that all the time during which Mr Steel was in London he was living there as a Scotchman who held to Scotland as his home, and was looking steadily forward to the time when he would return to it. But I think that matter is put beyond all question by the very clear evidence which Mr Steel has given, and which there is no reason whatever to doubt. He tells us himself that he had all along hoped to return to Scotland—meant to return to Scotland, I should rather say—and that he still regarded himself as a Scotchman, and that it was a mere question of time and convenience when he should return. We have also his evidence corroborated in all that he has said by his two friends who were examined, and who knew him intimately—by the fact proved in evidence, that again and again he was making inquiries about Scotch estates—and finally by the fact that he has returned to Scotland to live here, and is now resident at Braco. I notice that questions were put to Mr Steel as to whether this return to Scotland was not with a purpose, the suggestion being that he had acquired a domicile in England in the meantime, and that he desired to get rid of that domicile, and to acquire a Scotch domicile, or to appear to re-acquire a Scotch domicile without seriously meaning to do so. On that matter I think

Steel v. Steel.

Mr Steel was quite frank, as he was in all the rest of his evidence. He says that he had all along meant to return to Scotland, and that what he was waiting for was a time when he might be able to make such arrangements as would not require his close personal attention at business in London. He says quite frankly that his return to Scotland at the time he did return was indeed accelerated by the idea that it would be better that this question should be raised when he was residing in Scotland. He puts it, I think, very reasonably when he says,—"I had always intended to go and reside in Scotland, and the prospect of these proceedings may have accelerated the carrying out of that intention"; and in an earlier passage he says he never thought that change of residence was important. "No doubt," he says, "it was in my mind by way of stopping any suggestion about my not being a Scotchman on account of my residence away from Scotland." It does not appear to me that the circumstance of his intention to raise such an action as the present having accelerated his return to Scotland—his return to Scotland having been in his mind all along, and he always having regarded Scotland as his home—is of any moment. His having come to Braco, thinking it might be of advantage to him with reference to these proceedings, while carrying out the intention that he had all along entertained, does not appear to me to have any serious bearing on the question now before us. On the whole matter it appears to me that Mr Steel never abandoned his Scottish domicile, and so never acquired any other.

Lord Adam was absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and find that the pursuer's domicile of origin was in Scotland, that he had never changed that domicile, or acquired another: Repel the 1st, 3d, 4th, and 5th pleas for the defender; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof of their averments, and to proceed farther in the case."

Robertson's Trustee v. Nicholson.

Walter Galbraith (Robertson's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—Shaw—J. G. Stewart.

Benjamin Nicholson, Defender (Reclaimer).—Sir Charles Pearson—C. S. Dickson.

Robert Kedie, Defender.

Foreign—Jurisdiction—Trust.—A person carrying on business in Scotland granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors to two trustees, one of whom resided in Scotland and the other in England. In an action of accounting raised in Scotland against both trustees, the trustee residing in England pleaded no jurisdiction. The Court repelled the plea, on the ground that the trust-estate was in Scotland.

Lord M'Laren's opinion in Kennedy v. Kennedy, 12 R. 275, approved.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

The affairs of the firm of James Robertson & Company, tailors and clothiers in Glasgow, of which James Robertson was the sole partner, having become embarrassed, Robertson, on 5th June 1886, granted an assignment or trust-deed in English form in favour of Robert Kedie, a partner of the firm of Stewart, M'Donald, & Company, warehousemen, Glasgow, and Benjamin Nicholson, accountant, London, for behoof of four creditors of his firm, two in Glasgow and two in London. On 16th July following Robertson granted a second trust-deed in favour of the same two persons, as trustees for behoof of all his creditors.

On 23d May 1887, Robertson having died meantime, his estates were sequestrated by the Court of Session, and Walter Galbraith, accountant, Glasgow, was appointed trustee.

Galbraith now sued Kedie and Nicholson in an action of count, reckoning, and payment in respect of their intromissions with the bankrupt estate.

The defender Kedie stated that he had paid over all the funds in his hands (amounting to a small sum only) to the pursuer, and that he had left the management almost entirely to Nicholson.

The other defender, Nicholson, pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction. . . . (5) In respect of the proceedings in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England, this defender should be assoilzied, or otherwise the present action should be dismissed.

Nicholson stated, inter alia ;—(Stat. 3) "On the 19th November 1887 Kearsley & Co." (who were one of the two English creditors above referred to) "issued a writ calling on the pursuer and the defenders in this action to enter appearance in an action at the instance of Kearsley & Co., raised in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, London, and the said writ was duly served. In said action the said Kearsley & Company claim to have the trusts under the said two deeds of 5th June and 16th July 1886 carried into execution under the direction of the said Chancery Division, and to have an account taken of the moneys received by the defenders Benjamin Nicholson and Robert Kedie, under the same. The pursuer and both of the defenders have appeared in said action, which is now proceeding, and in the said action this defender has consigned in Court £500 of the funds recovered by him, to abide the orders of Court. . . ." (Stat. 4) "The defender is resident in England, and is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session." He admitted that Robertson had been a domiciled Scotsman.

It was stated in answer by the pursuer that the whole trust-estate was situated in Scotland, and that Kearsley & Company, who were the only creditors who did not support him, were personal friends of Nicholson, and were acting in concert with him to prevent the pursuer from getting possession of the estate. It was further set forth that Nicholson had appeared to oppose the granting of sequestration in the Bill-Chamber. The pursuer further stated in answer to statement 3 quoted above, —(Ans. 3) "The proceedings in London here mentioned are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made. Denied that any sum has been consigned in said action in terms of any order of the English Court. It is, however, believed and averred that the defender Nicholson after the present action was raised, and in order to prevent or impede the accounting which is sought in the said action, made, at his own hand, a deposit of £500. He did so in spite of the protest of his co-trustee, Mr Kedie, and in spite of the repeated demands by that gentleman that the accounts of the trust should be produced, and payment of the estate made over to the present pursuer. Explained further, that in the said proceedings in the High Court of Chancery, which were raised by Kearsley & Company, acting in concert with the defender Nicholson, an order was made for service of the writ upon the defender Kedie, and also upon the present pursuer, as being furth of the jurisdiction. The said defender and the pursuer, by motion on 21st December 1887, applied for the discharge of said order, and after discussion Mr Justice North, sitting in judgment upon said date, discharged the order for service, and found the plaintiffs liable in costs. It is, accordingly, impossible that any progress can be made with the proceedings in England, and it is explained that the same were taken solely for the purpose before mentioned, No. 166. namely, to avoid, if possible, any accounting by the defender Nicholson to the pursuer of the present action."

July 13, 1888. Robertson's Trustee v. Nicholson.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 20th March 1888, repelled the defender's first plea in law, and appointed the case to be put to the roll for further procedure.*

* "OPINION.—The estates of James Robertson, a tailor and clothier in Glasgow, now deceased, were sequestrated by the Court of Session in May 1887, and the pursuer was appointed trustee upon the estate. It is averred on behalf of the pursuer that the whole estate is situated in Scotland. No counter averment is made by the defender Nicholson. He admits 'that the said James Robertson was a domiciled Scotchman, and lived and carried on business in Glasgow.'

"Robertson before the sequestration executed two deeds conveying over his property to the defenders in this action in trust for the benefit of his creditors. The defenders accepted the office of trustees under these deeds, and proceeded to ingather the estate. No dividend was paid by the trustees to the creditors. The defender Kedie intromitted with it only to a very small extent (£27, 10s.), which he has paid over to the pursuer, the other defender, Nicholson, having taken the chief management, which Kedie says he allowed him to do, as being an accountant, and therefore better fitted to discharge the duty as trustee. The pursuer now asks an accounting with these persons for their intromissions, and this upon the footing that the sequestration put an end to the trust in their favour. One of the trustees is resident in Scotland, where the estate is situated, and the other, Nicholson, is resident in England, and no arrestment to found jurisdiction has been used against him. The first plea in law for the defender Nicholson, which falls now to be disposed of, is, that this Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the action as regards him. If this plea be sustained, the alternatives would be that the pursuer must sue the defenders in an English Court, when the plea of Kedie would be that he is not subject to the jurisdiction, or that the pursuer must proceed with this action against Kedie in the Court of Session, letting Nicholson out of it; to which Kedie's answer would be, that he cannot be sued without calling his co-trustee; and in like manner the same answer would be open to Nicholson in an English Court if he was sued there alone without Kedie. Nicholson after this action was in Court instituted a suit in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England in name of Kearsley & Company (creditors for whom he is acting), to have the trusts under the two deeds carried into execution under the direction of that Court, and to have an account taken of the moneys received by the defenders. This proceeding was taken against the protest of the defender Mr Kedie. An order for service of the writ upon Kedie and the pursuer was obtained, but upon 21st December 1887 this order was discharged, with costs, by Mr Justice North, who said,—'It seems to me that, on the grounds both of convenience and expense, it is very much better that the matter should be litigated in Scotland.' His Lordship referred to the present action, and said,—'There is a proceeding going on in Scotland by Galbraith, as trustee representing the estate of the debtor, against the other two persons who are the trustees of these deeds, in which proceeding Nicholson, the English trustee, has entered an appearance. He therefore is properly before the Court with respect to those deeds. . . . It seems to me that every question between these parties can be fairly and conveniently dealt with there. . . . . Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the cost and convenience are both in favour of their being tried in Scotland, and there is nothing in them in any way to prevent their being so tried, because, although the two deeds are said to be in English form, they are in a form which is perfectly intelligible. . . . I do not see anything in them whatever to prevent their being equally well administered by the Court in Scotland as by the Court in England. Further than that, there are questions which, it appears to me, must necessarily arise relating to Scotch law, with respect to which it is far more convenient, and far better as regards the evidence, that they should be dealt with by a Scotch Court, which knows what the Scotch law is, The Lord Ordinary thereafter allowed a proof, and Nicholson thereupon reclaimed against both interlocutors.

than that they should be dealt with by an English Court, which is not at any-rate familiar with Scotch law, and which cannot know anything whatever of it except as a matter to be proved by the attendance here of experts to state what the Scotch law is. Convenience and expense, in my opinion, require that I should not allow the two defendants, who are resident in Scotland, to be brought here to litigate the question in dispute, though, as I have said, I can conceive a state of things possible hereafter—though I do not think it likely to arise—in which some proceedings might be necessary in England in which these persons might be served and made defendants here, so as to litigate the matter here.'

"Thus, then, so far as regards the English Court, there is no action pending as against Kedie, and the question now arises whether the present action against both defenders can be allowed to proceed. It would certainly be a case of great hardship if the pursuer were obliged to raise two actions—one against Kedie in Scotland and another against Nicholson in England—in regard to an accounting for intromissions with an estate of which both parties were trustees, and this all the more that, as pointed out by Mr Justice North, the first question to be determined is one of Scotch law,—as to the effect of a Scotch sequestration on the prior trust-deeds. The case of the Magistrates of Wick v. Forbes, &c. (11th December 1849, 12 D. 299) shews that an action may be competent in the Scottish Courts against executors, although a number of them may be resident abroad, and no arrestment to found jurisdiction be used. On the other hand, the case of Gillon & Co. v. Dunlop and Collett (27th February 1864, 2 Macph. 776) is an illustration of the rule that the Court will not entertain an action against an executor resident abroad, where a more convenient forum for trying the case exists in England. But in that case no part of the executry estate was situated in Scotland; it was under distribution in terms of a will executed in India, and under the authority of the foreign Court. This distinguishes that case from the present one.

"According to the practice of the Court of Chancery, the objection to the jurisdiction in such a case as this would be repelled, as is illustrated by the case of Seymour v. Seymour (27th January 1888, 84 Law Times, p. 242, and 4 Times Law Reports, 250), before Mr Justice Chitty. There were here several defendants, some residing in England, and some residing in Ireland. Two parties in Ireland, interested in the matter as sub-mortgagees, moved to discharge the order for service out of the jurisdiction, on two grounds:—(1) That the cause of action against them was one in which no parties within the jurisdiction were interested, and that consequently there was no jurisdiction to make the order; and (2) that any question, so far as they were concerned, might effectually be raised in proceedings now pending for sale of the mortgaged estates in the Land Court in Ireland, and consequently that the Court ought not to exercise the jurisdiction, even if it possessed it. Mr Justice Chitty, in delivering judgment, said that, 'with regard to the defendants' first ground of objection, in his opinion all the defendants were necessary parties to the action, wherever it might be tried. The cause of action was the same against all, although the remedies against, and the liabilities of, the different defendants were different. With regard to the second objection, if he were to uphold it, either the parties resident in England would have to be served with the proceedings in Ireland, or two sets of proceedings would have to be carried on, one in England and the other in Ireland. In the first alternative, the parties resident in England would raise exactly the same objection in the Irish Courts, to be taken to Ireland, and the result would be a deadlock. In the second alternative, there would also be two sets of proceedings, one in England and the other in Ireland, in each of which all the same evidence would have to be gone through. Therefore, on the ground of comparative cost and convenience, he came to the conclusion that the action in this Court should continue as at present constituted, and that the defendants were properly served.' Upon the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied that this Court has jurisdiction to try Certain amendments were thereafter allowed by the Court to be made upon the record, but as these dealt chiefly with the proceedings in the sequestration, and did not affect the general question upon which the decision of the Court ultimately turned, it is unnecessary to refer to them further.

Argued for Nicholson;—The Scottish Courts had no jurisdiction over him. I. Neither the fact that the truster's domicile was in Scotland when the trust was constituted, nor the fact that confirmation was taken out in Scotland, was sufficient to found jurisdiction.[1] The cases, such as Watt v. Richmond's Trustees,[2] in which the jurisdiction had been upheld, because of the existence of heritable estate within it, were not opposed to this view. The case of Kennedy, 12 R. 275, was that of a Scottish marriage-contract trust where one of the trustees was domiciled in Scotland, all the funds being also there. It did not therefore apply. Lord Blackburn's view in the Orr Ewing case (13 R. (H. of L.) 18) also supported this contention. [LORD PRESIDENT.—I think Lord Blackburn has misread the case of Preston v. Melville,[3] and if none of the other Judges in the House of Lords take the same view, I cannot adopt it.] There was no decision which would subject the reclaimer to the jurisdiction. The case of Gillon[4] was a case of forum non conveniens and was not applicable, and the case of the Magistrates of Wick[5] was decided on the ground that there had been confirmation. Mr Justice North, in his opinion, delivered in discharging the order for service of the writ in this case, had gone wrong in treating Nicholson's appearance in the present action as an appearance for all purposes,—his Lordship had not understood that in Scotland it was only by entering appearance that the jurisdiction could be objected to. As matter of fact Nicholson had consigned £500 in the English Courts, and part of the estate was therefore there. Further, Kearsley & Company, the English creditors whom Nicholson represented, were not here at all, and neither they nor Mr Nicholson had taken any part in the sequestration since it was granted. These were very important facts in the consideration of the question.[6] Further, it did not follow that the trust-deed was put an end to by the sequestration,[7] nor could the Scottish Courts proceed upon the ground that the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction over Kedie. II. The plea of reconvention, which had been founded on, did not apply.[8] It was always held to be excluded unless the two actions were pending at the same time. But all Nicholson had done in the sequestration was to appear to oppose its being granted. After that he had taken no further step in the sequestration. It was no doubt true that Kearsley & Company had put in a claim, but this action was not brought, and could not be brought, against them. Nicholson and Kearsley & Company were not identified; he held the funds for many purposes other than for payment of their particular debt. The law on this subject had never gone further than in Ord v. Barton.

Argued for the trustee;—I. There were two facts in the case of great importance in the question of jurisdiction,—(1) The bankrupt estate was situated in Scotland, and the bankrupt had been a domiciled Scotsman; and (2) one of the two trustees who were called as defenders was resident in Scotland, and that had been held to be enough to found jurisdiction.[1] If the contrary were held, it would lead to great inconvenience and expense. Mr Justice North had taken the right view of the matter. II. Besides Nicholson had submitted himself to the jurisdiction, in the first place, by appearing to oppose the sequestration, and in the second place by the fact that Kearsley & Company, with whom Nicholson was practically identified, and of whom he was at anyrate the representative, had lodged a claim in the sequestration. The plea of reconvention therefore was well founded.

Lord President.—The pursuer of this action is trustee upon the sequestrated estate of the late James Robertson, a tailor in Glasgow, who carried on business there for a number of years. His trade was very much confined to Glasgow and its neighbourhood; but of course he had some creditors in England also, although apparently a very limited number. His assets were all in this country, and his debts, with a trifling exception, were in this country also. His estate, therefore, was essentially a Scottish estate, and fell to be distributed among Scottish creditors. It appears that in the difficulties in which Robertson found himself prior to his death he had executed two deeds of trust in favour of Mr Kedie, who is a Glasgow merchant, and of the reclaimer, Mr Nicholson, who is an accountant in London. The first is dated 5th June 1886, and looks very like an attempt to create a preference in favour of a certain class of creditors. I give no opinion whether it does so or not, but undoubtedly, as appears upon the face of the deed itself, the granter was at the time insolvent. Another trust-deed was granted in July 1886 in favour of the same trustees, conveying to them his entire estate for behoof of the whole body of creditors. It is needless to say that these trusts were superseded by the sequestration.

The object of the present action is to call the trustees under these two deeds to account for their intromissions. As to the title of the trustee in the sequestration to bring the action there can be no doubt. But Mr Nicholson pleads that he is not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court,—he being a domiciled Englishman carrying on business in London. He contends that the action cannot be maintained against him in this Court. The result of that contention would be that, pari ratione, an action in the English Courts could not be maintained against Kedie, the other trustee, because he is a domiciled Scotsman. There would require to be two actions, one against one trustee in one country, and another against the other trustee in the other country. And so a deadlock would arise, or at least the great inconvenience of pursuing one trustee in the one country and another in the other in an action for what ought to be a joint accounting.

It appears to me that there are good grounds for holding that where trustees are liable jointly to account for their intromissions, as they undoubtedly are here, the proper forum to try the question is the forum of the country where the trust is said to subsist and where it comes to be executed. In this case that is Scotland. The estate is a Scottish estate belonging to a Scottish trader; it falls to be uplifted in Scotland, and to be distributed for the most part among Scottish creditors. The liability to account is indivisible, and the accounting must be carried on in a process in which both or all the trustees must be summoned. In a case of this kind the jurisdiction of the Court is founded not upon domicile, but upon the situation of the funds of the trust.

I am very much disposed to adopt the views taken by Lord M'Laren in the case of Kennedy v. Kennedy (12 R. 282) in which his Lordship says:—"Where a trust is constituted in Scotland, and is to be executed in Scotland, the Supreme Court of this division of the United Kingdom has jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter of the trust, including in that expression not only the interpretation of the trust, but the duty of making due provision for its continuance, and the power, in cases of negligent administration, of calling the trustees or trustee to account. It is matter of frequent occurrence that a body of marriage trustees, having originally the domicile of the spouses, become in some degree scattered before the necessity for administering the trust arises; and it would be mischievous in the extreme if it were necessary to take separate action against the different members of the trust in the various parts of Her Majesty's dominions or elsewhere, in which they might be resident for the time. The obligation of trustees to account for their administration is one and indivisible, and is in general to be enforced by an appeal to the Courts of the country in which that obligation is to be fulfilled, and where the trust is to be executed."

His Lordship's judgment in that case sustaining the jurisdiction of this Court against a trustee who was an Englishman was not taken to review, and therefore, in so far as that case was concerned, the decision rested solely on the authority of Lord M'Laren. But in my view, the principle there expressed is directly applicable, and I am therefore for refusing this reclaiming note.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. In addition to what your Lordship has said as to this being the estate of a Scottish trader, the majority of whose creditors are in Scotland, it is not unimportant to observe that it also now appears that the whole estate has been sequestrated in Scotland, which is therefore the forum where it must be finally wound up. It is therefore, I think, most desirable, if not necessary, for the due and convenient administration of the trust-estate that the defender, who is one of the original trustees, should answer in Scotland for his intromissions along with his co-trustee, and be subject to the jurisdiction of this Court.

LORD SHAND.—The inconvenience which would result if effect were given to the reclaimers' argument would be necessarily very serious. A trust-deed has been executed in this country—one of the two trustees being in this country, and the other in England—and they have now been called upon to account for their intromissions. If we were to give effect to the argument which has been submitted, it would come to this, that there would be one action in the Courts of Scotland against one of the trustees, and another in the English Courts against the other—and questions of nicety might possibly have to be decided in the two Courts—it may be with a different result in each. The only possible way of removing the difficulties which would thus arise is to hold that both the trustees are subject to the jurisdiction of one Court, and bound to account there. It is essential that both should be convened in one Court, for a defence may be stated for one which involves the liability of the other, and justice requires that each should be heard in the same process. It may be a question of convenience which Court ought to decide the question on the merits, but in the present case I have no doubt. This is a Scottish trust which was executed for the purpose of collecting and administering and distributing a Scottish estate in great part among Scottish creditors. I am of opinion that this Court not only has jurisdiction, but that this is likewise the convenient forum. That seems to me to be all the clearer because Nicholson has endeavoured to have the trust administered in the English Courts but has failed in his endeavour, because Mr Justice North thought that "on the grounds both of convenience and of expense, it is very much better that the matter should be litigated in Scotland."

Robertson's Trustee v. Nicholson.

I also adopt the view which was taken by Lord M'Laren in the case of Kennedy to which your Lordship has referred.

Markey v. Colston.

JOHN MARKEY, Petitioner.—G. W. Burnet—Forsyth.
JAMES COLSTON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—C. J. Guthrie.

Parent and child—Custody—Child placed voluntarily in charge of charitable institution.—A father voluntarily placed his child, aged ten months, in the hands of the directors of a charitable institution for children, who, in pursuance of their scheme for the benefit of the children under their charge, sent the child to a branch of the institution in Nova Scotia. Ten months after parting with the child the father petitioned the Court for an order on the directors to deliver it to him. The Court remitted to the Sheriff of the county to inquire into the case, and subsequently ordained the directors to bring the child within the jurisdiction. This having been done the Court resumed consideration of the cause. It appeared from the report of the Sheriff that the child when it was received into the institution was nearly starved, and much emaciated, and that the parents were both confirmed drunkards, and lived in great poverty and misery in a wretched room in which there was little or no furniture. The Court being satisfied that the welfare of the child would suffer if it were restored to its parents, in the special circumstances of the case refused the prayer of the petition.

M.

ON 19th December 1887 John Markey, ship-rigger, Leith, presented a petition to the First Division in which he prayed the Court to find that he was entitled to the custody of his child, John Markey, and to ordain James Colston and Others, the directors of the Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, to deliver up the child to him.

He stated "that the petitioner, in consequence of domestic affliction, in or about the month of February 1887, applied to the directors of the Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, and Miss E. M. Stirling, founder and honorary superintendent thereof, for the temporary admission of his son, John Markey, an infant aged ten months, to the Homes of the said institution, which was agreed to, and his said son was thereupon received into the Home of the said institution situated in High Street, Edinburgh, and the said directors and the said Miss Stirling undertook his safe custody during his residence there.

"The petitioner, being desirous of resuming the custody of his said son, has frequently applied to the said directors and Miss Stirling to deliver up the said child to him, but they have refused to do so."

The directors lodged answers, in which they stated:—"1. Early in the said month of February 1887, the petitioner applied at the respondents' Shelter for Children at 150 High Street, Edinburgh, for the admission into the respondents' said Shelter of his infant son John Markey, stated by him to be fourteen months old. The petitioner stated to the nurse to whom he applied, that the child had been much neglected, and that it had been fed on whisky. The respondent Mr Young went to see the child, to ascertain if it was a fit subject for admission to the Refuge. He found it had been shockingly neglected, and he reported that it seemed to be in a dying state. In consequence of this report, and in the absence of suitable accommodation for such cases, the petitioner's application was refused, . . . 2. Later in February the petitioner again applied for the child's admission. He stated that he had made no previous application, when it was pointed out to him that the child had been already refused admission; and he at last confessed that he was the same man who had previously applied. He then urged that the case was even more necessitous than it had been before. He said that his wife was behaving worse than ever; that she had sold her children's clothes for drink, that she had been seven days in prison for assault and breach of the peace, and that after coming out of prison she had deserted him. He also stated that, owing to his employment on the Forth Bridge, he was obliged to be away from his house from early morning till evening, and that the child was left all day on the floor of the house to look after itself. This account was substantially confirmed by a neighbour, Mrs Murray, who also pled for the child being taken into the Home. According to her account, the mother of the child was sometimes out all night in the streets carrying the child with her, and she stated that the child at such times had hardly any clothing to protect it from the severe winter weather prevailing at the time. 3. In these circumstances, the respondents agreed to receive the child into the Shelter for Children, 150 High Street, Edinburgh. Before the child was received a form of application for its admission was signed by the petitioner, which is produced herewith and referred to. The information contained in the said form was obtained from the petitioner. These entries are referred to, and in particular the eleventh entry, which is as follows:—'(11) State circumstances connected with child causing this application.—Mother in prison, and father goes out all day, and has no one to look after the child.' 4. The respondents had no means of ascertaining whether the statements made by the petitioner and the said Mrs Murray were correct. They believed them to be true, and they were amply corroborated by the appearance and conduct of the child when admitted. It bore all the appearances of the grossest neglect. The certificate of the nurse who received it, written at the time, is as follows:—'I hereby certify that I have stripped and examined the child referred to above, and find it very delicate, and sore on arm through neglect. C. Malloch, nurse.' She now states 'that it was a perfect skeleton, bones nearly through; and that it was ravenous for food.' When admitted, it had absolutely no clothing whatever, and was covered only by an old dirty shawl lent by the said Mrs Murray, which was returned to her when the child was left under the respondents' charge. 5. The petitioner subsequently signed a form of application for the child's admission to the respondents' Homes. The Shelter above referred to is intended for the temporary relief of urgent cases. The Homes are for the reception of children for lengthened periods. Of this the petitioner was well aware when he signed the form of application last above mentioned, which is produced and referred to. The petitioner's application was acceded to by the respondents, and the child was sent to the respondent's Home at Merleton, Wardie, on 25th February 1887. 6. When the petitioner first applied to the respondents, and all through his subsequent dealings with them, he led them to believe that he desired them to take the entire charge of his child, and to act towards it in such a manner as seemed to them best fitted to promote its interests. They understood that not only was he unable to take charge of the child, but that owing to his wife's habits and other circumstances, he saw no prospect of being able to look after it in the future. In accordance with an agreement endorsed on the form of application, second above mentioned, he undertook to pay to the respondents 2s. 6d. per week for the child, but he only paid altogether a sum of 5s. The petitioner is at present due for the board of the child £6, 10s. to the respondents. 7. The child was kept at Merleton from 25th February to about 12th April, when, in consequence of an outbreak of measles at Merleton, it was removed to Beattock, where Miss Stirling was in the habit of boarding children in their weaker condition. On 26th April it was taken by Miss Stirling, along with other children, to Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia, in the neighbourhood of Aylsford, King's County, Miss Stirling has purchased a farm, on which she has erected, and maintains, under suitable management, a house where children, destitute and neglected in this country, are sent out. These children are placed in suitable homes in Nova Scotia, and a prospect of comfort and usefulness is thus opened to them which would be impossible in this country. Shortly after the child had been taken to Merleton the father called, accompanied by his wife, and was taken into the house and shewn the child. He then expressed himself as satisfied as to the care that was being taken of the child, and said that he was leaving Edinburgh in search of work, and had come to bid it good-bye. The petitioner called once again to inquire after the child, and his wife also called on two other occasions. They left no address, and the respondents were thus unable to communicate with them before removing the child from Merleton, but in the interests of the child's physical and moral wellbeing, and in the exercise of the discretion which the petitioner had expressly committed to them, the respondents resolved to send the child to Nova Scotia. During the period of its residence in the Shelter and at Merleton, the child rapidly improved in health, and it has continued to thrive during its residence in Nova Scotia, the climate of which is well suited for its constitution. The petitioner's wife called, after the child had been in the course of last summer taken to Nova Scotia, at the High Street Shelter, and was informed as to the child's then residence. (8) The respondents submit that, in the circumstances, they were justified in the whole proceedings taken by them relative to the said child, and that they are not bound to bring the child back from Nova Scotia and deliver it to the petitioner. So far as they can ascertain, the petitioner is in no better circumstances to secure proper attention and care for the child than he was at the time when it was handed over to the respondents. In Nova Scotia the child is comfortably fed and clothed and housed. In due time it will be suitably educated, and no difficulty will be found in obtaining for it remunerative employment. The children are in great demand among farmers and others, by whom they are brought up to their own business. On the other hand, the respondents believe and aver, that if the child is brought back, it will be deprived not only of the comfort and health which it is at present enjoying, but of its prospects of happiness and usefulness for the future. But if the Court should be of opinion that the petitioner has not lost his technical right to obtain the custody of the child, the respondents maintain that the petitioner, through the statements made by him to them, and his failure to pay for its support, has been himself the cause of all that has taken place, and that payment by him of the child's board, and of the sum necessary for bringing the child home from Nova Scotia, ought to be made a condition precedent to the granting of the prayer of the petition."

On 3d March 1888 the Court remitted to the Sheriff of the Lothians to inquire into the circumstances of the petitioner, and into the matters of fact averred in the answers, and to report.

On 16th March 1888 the Sheriff (Crichton) reported as follows:—"The statements of fact contained in the answers are substantially correct. The petitioner, however, denied that when he applied for admission for his infant son to the respondents' shelter he informed Catherine Malloch, the matron, that his wife was in prison. He also stated that when he signed the application for the admission of the child to the respondents' Home, he thought it was only to be there temporarily, and until his wife should, as he expressed himself, 'get back to her natural senses.' He added that he understood it was a sort of nursery where he could go and get back his child when he liked. On the other hand, Catherine Malloch stated that the conditions were fully explained to him, and that he expressed his thankfulness at the prospect of the child being well cared for, as he would never see his wife again. On one occasion when he called at Merleton to bid good-bye to the child, he said he was satisfied the child was well taken care of, and that, above all things, it was to be kept from its mother. Miss Stirling admitted that she made no inquiry regarding the petitioner's address before the child was taken to Nova Scotia. I think it right to say that the statements of the petitioner and his wife cannot be relied on, as I found them, in regard to several particulars, untruthful.

"On Thursday, the 8th of March, I visited the house occupied by the petitioner and his wife at No. 5 Queen Street, Leith, where they have been residing since May 1887. It is a single room situated at the top of a land of four stories, and at the end of a passage in which there are several tenants. It is about 9 or 10 feet in length, and about the same in breadth. The ceiling slopes to the front, where it is only about 2 or 3 feet from floor. The part a person can stand upright in is about 6 feet high and 4 feet broad. The only articles of furniture in the room are an old iron bedstead, on which there is some straw in a very dirty packsheet ticking, but no bedclothes; a small form upon which two people could sit, and two small pails or tubs. Markey and his wife were in, also two of his children, girls, one aged six, the other eight. He said he was employed at the Forth Bridge, but had been off work for ten or eleven weeks in consequence of an accident. He had resumed work on Friday, the 2d March, but he had not been at work on Monday or Wednesday, and had missed the boat that morning. He can earn from 18s. to 22s. a-week. He said that as soon as he had earned a few weeks' wages he intended to remove to a better house. I was surprised to see the two children living in such a miserable place in such good health, but I afterwards ascertained that since the month of December they had been living at the Emigration Home for destitute children at No. 6 Lauriston Lane, under the name of Murray, and had only been brought home that morning. When he was disabled in consequence of the accident he received from the Forth Bridge Company 10s. per week. He also received from a charitable society 2s. a-week.

"The police informed me that they had visited petitioner's house on the 3d of January 1888, which they described as one of the most wretched dens they had ever seen. They found Mrs Markey very much under the influence of drink, and the petitioner lying on a shakedown in a corner, just awakened out of a drunken sleep. There was no bedstead in the room. Mrs Markey spoke to them in the most coarse and filthy language.

"I have ascertained that both the petitioner and his wife are persons of extremely intemperate habits. A Mrs Grubb, who resides at Queen Street, Leith, said she could not say she had ever seen them sober. When Mrs Markey had money she would be three or four times every day in the grocer's or publican's getting drink, which she took to her house. When she was unable to go herself, her children were sent for it. The children were allowed to go about in the coldest weather with only one garment, and without shoes or stockings, or any covering for the head. The petitioner and his wife make it a matter of general talk that they will make money in consequence of their child having been taken away from them."

On resuming consideration of the petition with the report, the Court ordained the respondents, ante omnia, to bring the child within the jurisdiction of the Court before 15th May.

This having been done, the petitioner moved that the prayer of the petition should be granted.

Argued for the petitioner;—The circumstances here were not such as to induce the Court to interfere with the legal rights of the parent. It was always a question of circumstances whether the Court would so interfere.[1] There were no averments here that the child would suffer physical hurt if it were given over to the charge of the petitioner. The father's right to the child was absolute.

Argued for the respondents;—The circumstances here were very strong, and shewed that the child would suffer both morally and physically if restored to the father. The Court ought to consider both the moral and physical welfare of the child.[2]

In answer to the Court, counsel for the petitioner stated that he could not point to any material change of circumstances since the date of the Sheriff's report, with this exception, that the petitioner was now regularly employed on the Forth Bridge works.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition by a workman, describing himself as a ship-rigger, for the recovery of the custody of his infant child. The right of the father to the custody is beyond dispute, but when it is necessary to bring a petition for the recovery of a child, that of course leads us to inquire how the custody was lost. On that point we have before us very full information. It appears that in February 1887 the petitioner applied to the respondents, who are the directors of an institution for children's aid and refuge, and asked them to take the child into their custody, and relieve him from further care of it, subject only to a small payment. The child was then ten months old. The respondents took the child, and they now resist the prayer of the petition on the ground that the petitioner is not fit to take charge of his child, and that his wife is still less so, and that delivery of the child to its parents would involve danger to its life.

[2] Sutherland v. Taylor, supra; Kennedy v. Steele, Nov. 16, 1841, 4 D. 12, 14 Scot. Jur. 4.

This is rather a singular kind of case, and we have given it our most serious consideration, and applied our minds to it carefully. The result at which I, and, I believe, your Lordships, have arrived is that the prayer should not be granted. The petitioner at the time that the child was delivered over to the respondents was living in a most wretched apartment in Leith. He was employed, when in work at all, at the Forth Bridge works, and was absent all day. He could not therefore take any charge of the child, and it was very natural that he should avail himself of this charitable institution. But further inquiry has shewn that the petitioner and his wife were in a state of extreme poverty, and that they were both of confirmed intemperate habits. In consequence this child and the other children of the family were allowed to go about half-clothed, their clothes having been sold for drink. The inquiry made by the Sheriff has resulted in bringing these facts to our notice.

Now, without going into the somewhat revolting details set forth in the Sheriff's report, I shall merely say that it seems to me that the health, indeed the life of this child, would be placed in great danger if we ordered that he should be delivered to his parents. It may be thought somewhat surprising that people in the condition of the petitioner and his wife should wish to have the child back, but we have a trace at least of a motive in the Sheriff's report, and it is to make money by trading on the charitable feelings of the respondents. The Sheriff states that he discovered this from their neighbours, and that being the only motive that is disclosed, I am inclined to believe that it is the true one; but apart from that I think there is sufficient evidence to justify us in refusing the prayer of the petition.

Lord Shand.—It is without doubt a serious thing to refuse to give a child of tender age into the custody of his parents (for I think we may take it that both the father and mother wish to have the child restored to them), and notwithstanding the flagrant circumstances of the case, I have felt the question to be attended with difficulty; but after full consideration I have come to the conclusion that the Court ought in the special circumstances of the case to refuse the prayer of the petition. In recent cases, which have for the most part occurred in questions under the Conjugal Rights Act, it has repeatedly been laid down, both here and in the House of Lords, that the interest of the child is the primary consideration for the Court, and I cannot doubt that here that interest clearly demands that the application should be refused. It must be observed that it is not proposed in this case to take the child from the custody of his parents; he was voluntarily given into the charge of the respondents, and they have provided him with a home and comforts. The father says he intended the arrangement to be merely temporary, but the whole circumstances narrated in the answers, and verified in the Sheriff's report, shew that that was not really in his view, but that it was intended that at least for a considerable time the charge of the child should be given up to the institution. If there were anything in the circumstances to shew that if the child were restored to its parents his interests would not suffer, I presume the petition would be granted; but, on the other hand, I think it is clear that if it is shewn that danger to the life or health of the child would follow, then the Court ought to refuse to give him back. Now, it is, I think, proved that the child when given to the respondents was in a wasted condition, and in a very emaciated state, and was indeed reduced almost to a skeleton. He was ravenous for food, and had only a shawl on to cover him. It was proved that the child was in an extremely delicate state of health, and that the father had no home to offer him, and if the Court be satisfied that it would be dangerous to restore the child, we should undoubtedly refuse the petition. The only difference now is that the child has been restored to health. Comforts and clothes have been given to him, but the report of the Sheriff shews that though the child is now healthy, the immediate result of restoring him to his parents would be that his health would inevitably suffer—that he would be starved, and his clothes would be taken away. The parents occupy a wretched room, in which there is no furniture, not even a bed; it is proved, too, that they are both confirmed drunkards, and that the mother is in the habit of taking the children's clothes and pawning them. In the whole circumstances, and looking to the paramount consideration of the welfare of the child, I think the application should be refused.

LORD ADAM.—I am satisfied that to give up this child to its father would certainly result in injury to its life or health, and therefore I have no hesitation in concurring with your Lordships.

LORD MURE was absent.

LORD ELIBANK AND OTHERS (Lord Elibank's Trustees), Pursuers.—
Sir Charles Pearson—Low.
REV. JOHN HART (Minister of Aberlady), Defender.—Murray.

Teinds—Subvaluation—Dereliction.—Mere lapse of time is no bar to a subvaluation of teinds being approved, the right to obtain approbation being res meræ facultatis.

A subvaluation of teinds will not be held to be derelinquished unless there is evidence of an intention to abandon it.

Overpayments of stipend will not be evidence of the abandonment of a subvaluation if it appear that at the time of the overpayments the heritor making them was ignorant of the existence of the subvaluation.

In a process of approbation and valuation raised in 1886 for approbation of a subvaluation dated in 1630 it appeared that the pursuer and his predecessors had made large overpayments under successive localities since 1791, but that they had been ignorant of the subvaluation till 1885. Held that as the overpayments of stipend had been made in ignorance of the subvaluation, they did not shew an intention to abandon the subvaluation, and did not infer dereliction, and that the pursuer was entitled to decree of approbation, under reservation to the minister of such rights as he had acquired by prescription or otherwise to stipend, in excess of teind, as valued in the report of the subcommissioners.

July 16, 1888.
Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hart.

TEIND COURT.
Teind Clerk.

LORD ELIBANK AND OTHERS, trustees under a trust-disposition granted by his Lordship, brought in 1886 a process of approbation and valuation of the teinds of the lands of Ballencrieff (with certain exceptions), and of the lands of Lochiehill, lying in the parish of Aberlady. The defenders called were Lord Wemyss, titular of the teinds of the parish, and the Rev. John Hart, minister of the parish.

The pursuers averred that the teinds of these lands had been valued by the Subcommissioners for the Presbytery of Haddington in 1630; that the existence of the subvaluation first came to their knowledge, and to that of the other heritors of Aberlady, in the summer of the year 1885; that there was no mention of it in any of the processes of augmentation of the stipend of the parish; that its existence had been unknown to the predecessors of the pursuers and other heritors; and that the teinds in question had for a long time been believed to be unvalued.

The titular did not appear.

Defences were lodged for the minister, in which he stated that under localities of 1791, 1807, 1823, approved final on 30th June 1824, and locality of 1865, approved final in 1868, payments of stipend had been made in excess of the subvaluation, and pleaded;—The subvaluation sought to be approved of having been derelinquished by overpayments, the defender ought to be assoilzied, with expenses.

In answer to the pursuers' condescendence the minister, inter alia, averred,—"Not known that the pursuers' predecessors were misled as alleged. On the contrary, it does not appear, and it is not averred, that either Lord Elibank, or his agents, or his predecessors, or their agents, ever examined the report of the subvaluation and copy thereof in the Teind Office, or made any inquiry there about them, to ascertain whether their lands in the parish of Aberlady were valued or not until 1885, when the same information on the subject was obtained which might have been obtained nearly a century and a-half previously."

A proof was led before a commissioner. The following facts were established.

The pursuers had no heritable right in their teinds prior to 1870.

There had been augmentations of the stipend of Aberlady in 1673, 1733, 1791, 1806, 1824, and 1865.

Prior to the augmentation of 1791 the amount of stipend which was localled on the lands in question was less than the teind, according to the subvaluation.

The augmentation, however, of 1791, in which an interim locality was approved on 6th February 1792, changed this. The proportion of stipend localled by that interim locality on the lands in question exceeded their teind as valued in the subvaluation by £23, 9s. 5d.

After the augmentation granted in 1806 another scheme of locality was made up, and by interim locality, dated 1st January 1808, there was localled on the lands in question a proportion of stipend exceeding by £58, 3s. 4d. the teind in the subvaluation.

In 1824 the rule of payment thus existing was altered in consequence of the new augmentation of that year. The interim localities of 1792 and 1808 were rectified, and the whole augmentations then granted were localled upon Lord Elibank's lands, since the other heritors had heritable rights to their teinds and he had not. The augmentation granted in 1824 was also laid upon his lands, and the proportion of yearly stipend laid thereon exceeded the valued teind according to the subvaluation by £207, 5s. 6d.

In 1865 there was a further augmentation. It was also localled upon Lord Elibank's lands. The result was that there was localled upon his lands from and after that year £293, 13s. 5d. more than the teind as valued in the subvaluation.

The locality of 1865 was in operation when this action was raised in 1886.

With regard to the question whether the pursuers might have been aware of the subvaluation, it appeared that it was contained in a bound book of valuations by subcommissioners which had been for over a century in the Teind Office. This book contained the valuations of many other parishes in different presbyteries, and counties, such as Haddington, Elgin, Linlithgow, Meigle, Peebles, Cupar-Fife, &c., about fifteen in all.* There was also in the Teind Office what appeared to be a copy or duplicate of this book, but with the peculiarity that it did not contain the report relating to Aberlady. The pursuers endeavoured at the proof to shew that on inquiry at the Teind Office as to the teinds in the presbytery of Haddington the latter book would probably be shewn, but this averment was not established.

The teind records were, at least in part, carried to London by Cromwell in 1649. After the Restoration it was directed that they be retransmitted to Scotland, and they were despatched in hogsheads for that purpose. The vessel bringing them suffered shipwreck, but they were in part recovered and lay in hogsheads in the Laigh Parliament House for many years. In 1744 Lord Monzie, one of the commissioners, moved the Court of Teinds to remit to a committee of Judges to inspect the book of subvaluations. These Judges reported in 1745, and some years thereafter the book of subvaluations was removed from the Laigh Parliament House and placed in the custody of the Teind Clerk.

In order to shew that their predecessors were ignorant of the subvaluation, the pursuers founded on letters written by and for the Lord Elibank who was in possession at the time of the augmentation in 1791. Letters of 15th and 22d May 1791, by Lord Elibank to his agent, Andrew Hamilton, W.S., shewed his intention to oppose the augmentation on the ground that it was not necessary and that he paid a large sum already for stipend. It appeared also from these letters that there was an impression on the part of his Lordship and his advisers that a valuation had been led in a predecessor's time. In December 1791 his local agent, Mr Fraser, Haddington, wrote to Mr Hamilton this letter:—"D. Sir,—I am just now favd. with yours, and have to inform you that Mr Dudgeon is positively certain that Pat Lord Elibank got his teinds valued about or a little more than twenty years ago; and adds that all the tenants were examined upon their rents. Also that he, Mr Du., delivered a message at that time from Lo. E. to the late Earl of Hopetoun, advising him to follow the example, otherways that some day or other his Ldp. or his heirs would repent it. The exact period may be learned from the late Mr Mitchelson's books. I daresay Mr Anderson, his son-in-law, will be obliging enough to communicate any information in his power about it. It was handed down to the late Lord as a perfect matter of fact that the teinds had been valued. Whether you shall get a key to the exact period or not, I certainly think it right to make the search, and I think it must have taken place in 69, 70, or 71, or thereabouts.—I am, D. Sir, your most obdent. servt., ALEX. FRASER."

the right which he was said to have derelinquished.[1] Dereliction, like homologation, was founded on consent. It was proved that Lord Elibank and his predecessors did not know of the subvaluation. In the cases of Airlie and Fogo[2] the Court proceeded on the assumption that the heritor knew of the valuation. The mere fact of overpayment would not infer an intention to derelinquish a subvaluation. A very large overpayment was rather to be referred to ignorance of right than to an intention to derelinquish.

Argued for defender;—A use of overpayment was to be attributed to an intention to derelinquish. The fact of overpayment was the evidence, and in many of the cases the only evidence, from which the law presumed dereliction. The case of Alexander, as the report in the Jurist shewed, turned on a question of res judicata, not on the merits of a plea of dereliction. The only dictum applicable in the case was that of Lord Cuninghame, who said that there was there "sufficient to infer dereliction in any ordinary case." That dictum was favourable, therefore, to the defender. In Richmond v. Officers of State the Judges said that the knowledge which would found the plea must be either "proved or presumed." In Smollet v. Simpson there had been no overpayment under a final locality, the overpayments made had been very small, and they had occurred by reason of the use of a particular standard. The point of Fogo's case was that there was no fact proved but the fact of overpayment.[3]

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—This is an action of approbation and valuation at the instance of the trustees of Lord Elibank, of a subvaluation of the teinds of their lands of Ballencrieff and others, situated in the parish of Aberlady, against Lord Wemyss, the titular, and the Rev. John Hart, the minister of the parish. The only defence stated against the approbation is by the minister, who pleads that the subvaluation has been derelinquished by overpayments.

The subvaluation in question is dated 10th May 1630, and by it the teinds of the pursuers' lands are valued as therein set forth.

Augmentations of stipend in the parish were granted in 1673 and 1733, but as the proportion of the stipend then allocated on the pursuers' lands was less than the amount of teinds as valued in the subvaluation, it is unnecessary further to refer to them.

But in 1791 another augmentation was granted, when by interim locality, approved on 6th February 1792, the proportion of stipend localled on the pursuers' lands exceeded the valued teind by the sum of £23, 9s. 5d.

This continued to be the rule of payment down to 1806, when another augmentation was granted. By interim locality, dated 1st January 1808, the proportion of stipend localled on the pursuers' lands exceeded the valued teind by the sum of £58, 3s. 4d.

This continued to be the rule of payment down to 1824, when another augmentation was granted. The previous interim localities of 1792 and 1808 were then rectified, and the augmentations, which had by the interim localities been proportionally localled on the whole lands in the parish were now laid upon the pursuers' lands, the other heritors having heritable rights to their teinds, while Lord Elibank had not.

The whole of the augmentation granted in 1824 was also localled on the pursuers' lands, by which the proportion of stipend laid thereon exceeded the valued teind by the sum of £207, 5s. 6d.

This continued to be the rule of payment down to 1865, when another augmentation was granted which was also localled wholly on the pursuers' lands, making the excess of payment £293, 13s. 5d., and that continues to be the rule of payment down to the present time.

As to the fact, therefore, that large overpayments have been made by the pursuers and their predecessors, and continued for a long period, there can be no doubt. And the question in this case appears to me to be whether it is to be inferred from that fact, and from that fact alone, that the subvaluation has been derelinquished, for, so far as I am aware, the defender does not found on any other fact or circumstance as shewing, or tending to shew, that the subvaluation has been derelinquished.

Now, with reference to the law applicable to this case, I do not think that it is necessary to refer to any older decision than that of the Locality of Kinnoul (Shaw's Teind Cases, 105) in 1826, because it appears to me that the earlier decisions were considered in that case, and the principles stated which have since ruled such cases.

To the details of that case it is unnecessary to refer, but in giving judgment, Lord Balgray says,—"It is also important to attend to the principle on which dereliction rests. It differs from prescription, being founded on the consent of the party, and is very nearly the same with homologation. But it is an established rule that a party cannot be held to homologate a right unless he be in the complete knowledge of it, and I think that the same rule should apply to dereliction, and, therefore, that the Court has gone too far in holding slight overpayments to imply dereliction."

Lord Robertson, who I believe has always been considered a great authority in teind law, says,—"The only right which a subreport confers on an heritor is to get decree of approval of it. It is not lost by time alone, being res meræ facultatis. But if before he applies for approval he has abandoned the subreport, he cannot ask decree of approval. In considering however whether there has been abandonment, we must have clear acts indicative of the fact."

Lord Alloway says,—"I consider dereliction to be the same in point of principle as homologation, except that they act in opposite ways. In judging whether there has been homologation or not, you must look to the animus as well as the fact, and the same must be done in regard to dereliction or abandonment; we must see that there is a clear intention to derelinquish."

The Court in that case held that there had been no derelinquishment, and it appears to establish that there must be a clear intention to abandon the subvaluation, and it follows that there can be no intention to abandon a right without, as Lord Balgray says, a distinct knowledge of it.

In the case of Richmond v. The Officers of State in 1871, Lord Gifford thus stated the principle,—"It may perhaps be gathered as the result of all the cases that dereliction is not easily to be inferred, and if the acts inconsistent with the subvaluation can be reasonably explained, they will not have the effect of destroying the subcommissioners' report. In truth dereliction is not so much a question of law as a question of fact, depending upon the special circumstances of each case, the question of fact in each case being,—Has the heritor with or without precise knowledge of the subvaluation, deliberately elected to hold that the teinds of his lands are unvalued? If it is clear in point of fact he has so elected, then the subvaluation has been derelinquished. If the heritor has not so elected then the subvaluation has not been derelinquished. If the heritor has not so elected, he may still recur to the subvaluation, even although he may have submitted to some burdens, to which in strictness he is not liable."

Your Lordship and Lord Deas concurred with Lord Gifford. Lord Ardmillan says,—"On the plea of dereliction I have only a word to say. I think the law is well and clearly stated by Lord Robertson in 1826." He then quotes the passage I have already quoted from the Kinnoull case, and adds, "Overpayment may be sufficient to instruct abandonment. But that which must be clearly indicated is not the overpayment, which must be proved, but the abandonment, or, in other words, the intention to abandon must be clearly indicated by the overpayment. This necessarily introduces into the question the element of animus or intent,—not indeed as an element to be separately proved, but as an element to be indicated, or to be ascertained, by fair implication from the facts. I think that the tendency of recent jurisprudence is to limit the application of the plea of dereliction."

The last case, which has occurred on the subject is, I think, that of Smollet v. Simpson in 1885, in which your Lordship said in an opinion which was concurred in by the Court,—"Is it possible to deduce from this an intention to abandon the subvaluation? The heritor did not know that he was paying more in money than he was bound. No doubt he did not investigate the circumstances, but mere negligence—if that can be called negligence—is not sufficient to infer dereliction, for there must be a distinct intention on the part of the heritor to abandon the subvaluation."

These authorities establish that there must be a distinct intention on the part of the heritor to abandon the subvaluation, or in other words, he must have elected to abandon it.

Now, it appears to me that an heritor cannot elect to abandon a subvaluation if he did not know of its existence. The mere fact that overpayments have been made can never per se prove that the heritor elected to abandon the subvaluation, because it can never prove that he knew of the subvaluation. But if it be proved, or is to be presumed from facts and circumstances, that he knew of the subvaluation when making the overpayments, then it will be presumed that he had good reason for not producing and founding on the subvaluation, because it is not to be supposed that a man will make payments against his own interest. In the earlier cases of dereliction, in which the overpayments had been made, not many years after the date of the subvaluation, and before the records were carried away by Cromwell in 1649 or 1650, it was a reasonable presumption that an heritor must have known whether or not his teinds had been valued, and, accordingly, the controversy in these cases did not turn upon that point, but whether, assuming the heritor's knowledge, the overpayments could be explained or accounted for consistently with the heritor's having intended to maintain his valuation, it being contended on the one side that the overpayments were so insignificant in amount as not to warrant a presumption that the overpaying heritor intended to abandon his valuation; and, on the other, that the overpayments were such, in character or amount, as necessarily to infer that he intended to do so—for it was said that no man would voluntarily make overpayments without a good reason, and the reason commonly pleaded was that the heritor was sensible that valid objections lay against the valuation, which could easily have been substantiated if the report had been produced at an earlier period.

We know also, as matter of history, that in many cases heritors thought that their teinds were estimated beyond their value, whether originally or in consequence of the fall in the value of land which had taken place during the troubles, and for that reason also abstained from producing their valuations.

For such or similar reasons accordingly, it was decided that overpayments of a considerable amount, and continued for a lengthened period, presumed dereliction of a subvaluation, a principle appropriate and applicable to that class of cases.

But it appears to me that such reasons have no application to overpayments made, as in this case, for the first time in the year 1791, and in which the question is whether at the time of making the overpayments the heritor knew of his valuation.

Knowing what we do of the history of the teind records, that they were in part carried away by Cromwell, suffered shipwreck on their way back, were partially consumed by fire in 1700, and lay in hogsheads in the Laigh Parliament House for nearly 100 years—practically inaccessible to the public—would it be reasonable to presume, in such circumstances, that an heritor whose teinds had been valued in 1630, must have known of that fact in 1791? I do not think that it would. But if that presumption be not made in this case I know of no other presumption, or of any fact or circumstance tending to shew that the heritors, when they made the large overpayments in 1791, and subsequently, knew of the valuation.

It appears to me that the presumption arising from these large overpayments, rising from £23, 9s. 5d. in 1791 to £293, 13s. 5d. in 1865, is directly the other way. It is not in accordance with human experience that a man should voluntarily take upon himself such a burden. But, indeed, the burden which Lord Elibank then undertook, if he abandoned his valuation, was not limited to these overpayments, because, as he had no heritable right to his teinds, he at the same time made himself liable to the titular in all time coming for one-fifth of his rental. The defender has suggested no reason why Lord Elibank should have desired to abandon his valuation, and I can imagine none. The reasons which might have induced an heritor in earlier times to abandon his valuation did not exist in 1791, and have no place now.

It appears to me that the only possible way of accounting for the overpayments is the simple and natural one, that the heritor did not know of the subvaluation when he made them.

But, farther, the correspondence of 1791—which has been produced—shews that Lord Elibank was very much opposed to the augmentation which the minister was then demanding, and was certainly not at all likely to make any voluntary overpayment for his benefit. But there is one letter which appears to me to prove—were that necessary—that Lord Elibank and his agents did not know of the subvaluation. It is dated 22d December 1791, and is from Mr Fraser, Lord Elibank's country agent, to Mr Hamilton, his Edinburgh agent, and is in these terms,—"Dear Sir,—I am just now favoured with yours, and have to inform you that Mr Dudgeon is positively certain that Pat Lord Elibank got his teinds valued about or a little more than twenty years ago; and adds that all the tenants were examined upon their rents. . . . The exact period may be learned from the late Mr Mitchelson's books" (he had been Lord Elibank's agent). "I daresay Mr Anderson, his son-in-law, will be obliging enough to communicate any information in his power about it. It was handed down to the late Lord as a perfect matter of fact that the teinds had been valued. Whether you shall get a key to the exact period or not, I certainly think it right to make the search, and I think it must have taken place in 69, 70, or 71, or thereabouts."

The information thus furnished we know was erroneous, but it seems to be sufficiently clear that the one agent would not have urged upon the other agent a search for a supposed missing valuation, had they been aware of the existence of the subvaluation in question.

Upon the whole matter, accordingly, I am of opinion, not only that no presumption arises from the facts and circumstances proved in this case that Lord Elibank and his successors knew of the subvaluation when the overpayments were made; but I am further of opinion that it is to be presumed, and is proved, that they did not know of it.

It is said, however, by the defender, that the report of the Subcommissioners of the Presbytery of Haddington, including Aberlady among other parishes, has been in the Teind Office for upwards of a century, and has been, during that time, open to the inspection of the heritors interested, and has been examined and utilised by many of them, and it is said that if the pursuers and their predecessors were ignorant of the subvaluation, it is because they did not take the trouble to search the teind records or examine the report of the subcommissioners.

I think it is true that if the pursuers or their predecessors had made diligent search and inquiry they would probably have discovered the subvaluation in question. But, assuming that to be the fact, I am unable to see how it can bar them from pleading in the approbation proceedings the fact—if it be a fact—of their ignorance of the subvaluation and prevent due weight being given to that fact when proved. The minister was in no way prejudiced thereby, although it may very well be that the pursuers will have to suffer from the consequences of their negligence in this respect by having to continue to make the overpayments which they have already made, but that is a question with which we are not at present concerned.

The pursuers, on the other hand, endeavour to account for the subvaluation having escaped the notice of their predecessors by the existence in the Teind Office of an ancient copy of the report of the subcommissioners, which contains the subvaluations of all the parishes except that of Aberlady. This document, they say, was in use to be given out for examination in place of the original, and they suggest that it may have been so given out to the agents of their predecessors, and if so, that it would have misled them into thinking that there had been no valuation of the parish of Aberlady. In the view which I take of this case it is not necessary to consider this matter. I would only remark that there is no evidence that the pursuers or their predecessors or their agents ever did make any inquiry, or consequently that they were ever misled.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that there is no presumption that the pursuers, or their predecessors, when making the overpayments, were in the knowledge of the subvaluation. On the contrary, I think that the presumption is that they were ignorant of it,—that, consequently, being ignorant of it, they cannot have elected to abandon it, and therefore that, in law, the

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . ratify, allow, and approve of the report of the Subcommissioners of the Presbytery of Haddington libelled on so far as regards the lands libelled: Find and declare accordingly in terms of the conclusions of the libel, but reserving to the minister such rights as he has acquired by prescription or otherwise to stipend in excess of teind as valued in said report: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses, subject to modification," &c.

THE QUEENSLAND MERCANTILE AND AGENCY COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATOR, Petitioners.—Muirhead—Blair.

Foreign—Arrestments—Recall—Enforcement of order of English Court—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), secs. 122 and 123.—A having used arrestments to found jurisdiction, raised an action against a company in Queensland, and on the dependence arrested sums due to the company in the hands of its shareholders in Scotland.

The Queensland Company went into liquidation in Queensland, and subsequently applied for and obtained a winding-up order in London, where it had assets and creditors. The English liquidator then obtained from the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice an order restraining A from further prosecuting the action in Scotland, but bearing, "this order is to be without prejudice to the security, if any, upon the amounts payable by the Scotch shareholders which" A "has acquired by the proceedings taken in Scotland." The order further directed that the amounts received from Scottish shareholders in respect of a call should be placed to a separate account.

The liquidator then presented to the Court of Session (1) a petition praying for an order, under the 122d section of the Companies Act, 1862, to enforce the order of the Court of Chancery restraining A from further prosecuting the action in Scotland; and (2) a petition for recall of the arrestments.

In answer to the first petition A contended that he should be allowed to proceed with his action in order that the nexus created by his arrestment should be made an effectual security by decree, and, in answer to the second, that he was entitled to maintain his arrestments.

The Court granted an order restraining A from proceeding with the action, but subject to the orders of the Court, although at the same time they held it to be unnecessary, and granted the petition for recall of the arrestments, holding that the terms of the order by the Court of Chancery prevented the respondent from being prejudiced.

Company—Liquidator.—Observed that there is nothing incompatible in the co-existence of a Colonial and of an English liquidation of the same company.

Opinion (per Lord Shand) that it was incompetent for the Court to entertain objections to the validity of the order issued by the English Court.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

THE QUEENSLAND MERCANTILE AND AGENCY COMPANY, LIMITED, was a company duly incorporated under the laws of Queensland, Australia, having their registered office in Brisbane in that colony, but they had also a branch office in London. They had no office in Scotland.

In virtue of letters of arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem, dated 22d February 1887, raised against the Queensland Company, the Australasian Investment Company, Limited, a company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1883, and having its registered office in Edinburgh, caused arrestments to be used in the hands of J. T. Paton, Alloa, arresting in his hands funds due by him to the Queensland Company.

On 24th February 1887 an action was raised by the Australasian Company in the Court of Session, before Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, against the Queensland Company, concluding for payment of £40,000, or, alternatively, of £20,000.

In virtue of a warrant to arrest contained in the summons in that action, the Australasian Company caused arrestments to be used on the dependence of the action for various sums in the hands of J. H. Balfour, Edinburgh, and others, shareholders of the Queensland Company resident in Scotland, the sums arrested being the amount of calls due by them to the Queensland Company.

A record was made up in the action, but no interlocutor was pronounced disposing of any of the pleas in the action before Lord Kinnear.

On 28th October 1887 an order was made in the Supreme Court of Queensland that the Queensland Company should be wound up under the provisions of the Queensland Companies Act, 1863, and by order of the same Court, dated 18th November 1887, an official liquidator was appointed.

On 14th January 1888, on an application by the Queensland Company, an order was made in the High Court of Justice in England (Chancery Division) that the Queensland Company should be wound up by that Court under the provisions of the same Act; and by a further order, made on 28th February 1888, Mr E. Waterhouse was appointed official liquidator of the company in England.

On 9th March 1888 the Australasian Company applied to the High Court of Justice in England for leave to continue the above-mentioned action in Scotland notwithstanding the winding-up orders that had been made.

Of the same date the Queensland Company applied to the High Court of Justice in England to restrain the Australasian Company by injunction from further prosecuting the action.

After hearing counsel for the companies, the Court (Mr Justice North) did "not think fit to make any order upon the said motion" of the Australasian Company, but in the application of the Queensland Company, on 9th March 1888, pronounced this order,—"That the said Australasian Investment Company, Limited, their solicitors and agents, be restrained from further prosecuting the said action; but this order is to be without prejudice to the security, if any, upon the amounts payable by the Scotch shareholders in the Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited, in respect of the call made by the last-named company on the 14th day of December 1886, which the said Australasian Investment Company, Limited, has acquired by the proceedings taken by them in Scotland: And it is ordered that, without prejudice to any question between any of the parties claiming to be entitled to the proceeds of the said call made on the 14th day of December 1886, the liquidator do, instead of carrying all such proceeds to one account, as directed by the said order dated the 23d day of February 1888, carry such part of the proceeds of the said call as shall be received from Scotch shareholders to an account to be entitled 'Amounts received from Scotch shareholders in respect of call made on the 14th day of December 1886, on which the Australasian Investment Company claim to have security by reason of the proceedings in the action of the Australasian Investment Company, Limited, v. The Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited, now pending in the First Division of Her Majesty's Court of Session in Scotland.'"

That order was not appealed against, and became final.

Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co., Limited, v. Australasian Investment Co., Limited.

On 25th April 1888, on the application of the liquidator, the Scottish shareholders of the Queensland Company referred to in the above order were ordained to pay the sums due by them in respect of calls into the Bank of England in terms of the order.

That order was on 7th May 1888 duly registered, and a charge thereafter given to the shareholders in whose hands the arrestments on the dependence of the action in the Court of Session had been used.

On 20th June 1888 two petitions, in which the above facts were stated, were presented to the First Division of the Court of Session at the instance of the Queensland Company and its liquidator.

The first petition was presented under the provisions of sec. 122 of the Companies Act, 1862,* and prayed the Court to "pronounce an order upon the said Australasian Investment Company, Limited, their solicitors and agents, restraining them from further prosecuting the said action at present in dependence in this Court, at the instance of the said Australasian Investment Company, Limited, against the said Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited."

In the second petition the petitioners prayed the Court to recall the arrestments used on the dependence of the action before Lord Kinnear. In this petition for recall of the arrestments, the petitioners stated:—"That the security, if any, which the said Australasian Investment Company, Limited, have obtained by the use of the said arrestments is amply protected by the terms of the said order of 9th March 1888."

The Australasian Company lodged answers to both petitions. In both sets of answers the respondents stated:—"By the law of Queensland, and of England, and of Scotland, the effect of the orders of 28th October 1887 and 18th November 1887 was to transfer the whole assets, powers, and privileges of the Queensland Company to the official liquidator appointed by the order of 18th November 1887, subject, however, to all existing securities and preferences, and so far as not already legally attached, and especially without preference to these respondents' arrestments, so that it was not after November 1887 competent for the Queensland Company to present the petition to the High Court of Justice, on which the orders of 14th January and 28th February 1888, and subsequent dates, were pronounced, or for the said High Court of Justice to pronounce said orders of 1888; and the said orders of 1888 are illegal, invalid, and inept. The High Court of Justice of England had no power or jurisdiction to pronounce the said orders. These respondents were never in any way subject to the jurisdiction of said High Court.

"For a considerable time prior to the said application being made to the High Court of Justice of England the said Queensland Company had no place of business in England, and had ceased to carry on business in England, and had no assets or creditors in England."

In answer to the petition to enforce the order of the High Court of Justice in England, they further averred;—"These respondents therefore submit that the petition should be refused, in respect the same is incompetent; that the petitioners' averments are irrelevant, and, so far as material, unfounded in fact; and that the whole proceedings in the High Court of Justice in England, and particularly the order now sought to be enforced, are incompetent and invalid, and outwith the jurisdiction of said Court."

In answer to the petition for recall of the arrestments, they further averred;—"If the arrestments are recalled, in terms of the prayer of the petition, these respondents will lose all benefit whatever therefrom.

"These respondents therefore submit that the petition should be refused, in respect that the petition is incompetent; that the petitioners' averments are irrelevant, and, so far as material, unfounded in fact; that the whole proceedings before the High Court of Justice in England were incompetent and invalid, and beyond the jurisdiction of the said Court; and that these respondents, having duly used the said arrestments, the same ought not to be recalled until the action on which they are founded is disposed of, except on caution or consignation."

Argued for the petitioners—(On the petition to enforce the order of the English Court);—They were entitled to have the order of the English Court enforced in virtue of the provisions of sections 122 and 123 of the Companies Act, 1862, just as if it had been an order of a Scottish Court. The English Court had enforced a similar order granted by the Court in Scotland.[1] The Court of Session could not inquire into the merits of the order of the English Court,[2] and further, the respondents were barred from objecting to the jurisdiction of the English Court, as they had voluntarily appeared and made a motion before that Court.[3] The English Courts had on previous occasions granted winding-up orders in the case of colonial companies,[4] under section 199 of the Companies Act, 1862. Here the English was ancillary to the Australian liquidation.

(On the petition for recall of arrestments);—It was necessary to have the arrestments recalled, otherwise the Scottish shareholders could not pay to the liquidator's account, as ordered by the English Court. The arresting creditors' security was fully guarded by the order of Mr Justice North. A like reservation had been recognised in the Scottish Courts in the case of Benhar Coal Co. v. Turnbull.[4]

Argued for the respondents—(On the petition to enforce the English order);—Under sections 122 and 123 of the Act of 1862 an order was to be enforced in the same manner as it would be made in Scotland. In Scotland the action would have been allowed to proceed, so as to make the arrestments effectual by decree (Benhar Coal Co.'s case).[5] They had not prorogated the jurisdiction of the English Courts, as they had merely appeared there in reply to the call of the petitioners. This took them out of the rule of the Pacific Coast Mining Co.'s case. The English Court ought not to have granted a winding-up order, as in point of fact this company had no place of business in England, and no assets there.[6] The English cases cited by the petitioners were unsatisfactory, as they were all cases decided by one Judge only.

(On the petition for recall);—The terms of the English order were self-contradictory, as the respondents' preference was thereby made to be entirely dependent on their success in the Scottish action.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The order which is sought to be enforced in the first petition before us is one issued by Mr Justice North in the liquidation of the Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited, in England; and it has been contended by the respondents that that order ought not to be enforced, because the liquidation in which it was pronounced was not a statutory or valid liquidation. The company was in liquidation in Queensland before the application for the winding-up order was made in London; and that, it is said, precluded the possibility of any such English winding-up order being pronounced. I am in some doubt whether we ought to entertain that question, because we have before us an order of a competent Court of jurisdiction, whose orders presumably, and upon the face of them, are to be enforced in this country; and I doubt whether it is right that we should inquire into the validity of these orders, unless there is something upon the face of them that shews that they are incompetent. But I think it right to say that I have no doubt whatever of the competency of the English liquidation, assuming the facts to be as stated—that is to say, that the Queensland Company had a branch business in London, that they had assets there and creditors there, and shareholders in the country also. It has been contended that the effect of the liquidation is the same as that of a sequestration in making the administration of the estate of the company one and indivisible; but that I think is a mistake. In a sequestration under our statute of 1856 the entire estate of the bankrupt is transferred to the trustee wherever situated, and his title is of a very effective and strong kind; it makes him for the benefit of the creditors the absolute and exclusive proprietor of that estate, fortified by every kind of title that a statute is capable of conferring upon him. And, therefore, in such a case as that, it is quite impossible to say that there can be a second sequestration either in the same country or in a different country from that in which the first has taken place; the whole estate is vested in one person, and it cannot, therefore, become pro parte vested in some other person by a subsequent proceeding. But a liquidation is followed by a very different state of matters. The estate of the company is not transferred from the company to the liquidator, it remains vested in the company just as it was before the winding-up order, and the liquidator is a mere administrator of the affairs of the company. He can do nothing in the way of using action or diligence except in the name of the company; and the company never becomes dissolved, and never is completely divested of its estate until the liquidation has come to an end. It may, therefore, very well be, that although there is a winding-up in the colony which would enable the liquidator there to ingather the whole assets of the company, if he can reach them, it may aid him very much in the performance of that duty that there should be another liquidation in England or elsewhere where also the company has been carrying on business. There seems to me to be nothing incompatible in the coexistence of the two. Therefore the suggestion that the English liquidation is invalid and cannot possibly coexist with the Queensland liquidation I think is out of the case.

Then we have to consider this order pronounced by Mr Justice North; and what we are asked to do in the first petition is to enforce the order under the 122d section of the Act of 1862. I confess, my Lords, it appears to me that that is an unnecessary proceeding. The order is made against a party who is the pursuer of an action in this country, the Australasian Investment Company, Limited; and that order being imperative he cannot go on with his action. It is he that is restrained, and not the Court, by an order of this kind. No doubt it may be very proper that the existence of such an order should be made known to the Court in which the action which is restrained is going on; and of course the Court in which that action is depending will give immediate effect to the order pronounced in the liquidation, even supposing the pursuer of the action were seeking to go on in defiance of the order. But I think the 122d section is hardly applicable to such a case as that. The 122d section refers entirely to the enforcing of an order. Now, there are many orders pronounced in an English liquidation that require to be enforced in this country. An order for payment of calls is the most familiar of all; but there are a great many others besides that which require to be enforced by diligence if necessary; but merely to repeat this order of Mr Justice North is not, in my opinion, enforcement in any proper sense of the term. However, if it be thought of any advantage to the parties that we should repeat the terms of Mr Justice North's order I am quite willing to do it; subject, however, to the future orders of the Court, because there may arise a change of circumstances which may alter the position and rights of the parties altogether. With that qualification, I am for granting the prayer of the first petition.

In regard to the petition for the recall of the arrestments, I think that is a demand which the Queensland Company and its liquidator are entitled to make in the circumstances; because I am satisfied that the preference which the Australasian Company would have acquired if they had carried their point—which, of course, is not before us—is completely saved by the terms of Mr Justice North's order. He makes this restraining order against the Australasian Company, but under this condition, that it "is to be without prejudice to the security, if any, upon the amounts payable by the Scotch shareholders in the Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited, in respect of the call made by the last-named company on the 14th day of December 1886, which the said Australasian Investment Company, Limited, has acquired by the proceedings taken by them in Scotland; and it is ordered that, without prejudice to any question between any of the parties claiming to be entitled to the proceeds of the said call made on the 14th day of December 1886, the liquidator do, instead of carrying all such proceeds to one account, as directed by the said order dated the 23d day of February 1888, carry such part of the proceeds of the said call as shall be received from Scotch shareholders to an account to be entitled 'Amounts received from Scotch shareholders in respect of call made on the 14th day of December 1886, on which the Australasian Investment Company claim to have security by reason of the proceedings in the action of The Australasian Investment Company, Limited, v. The Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited, now pending in the First Division of Her Majesty's Court of Session in Scotland.'" It is said that this does not save the preference which the Australasian Company would have acquired if they had been enabled to prosecute their action against the Queensland Company, and bring it to a conclusion by a decree, and this is founded upon what is a perfectly sound view of the nature of an arrestment upon the dependence. No doubt an arrestment upon the dependence creates a nexus merely upon the fund arrested, and it does not become an active security by means of which payment can be operated until a decree is pronounced in the action upon the dependence of which the arrestment is used. That is perfectly sound in point of law. But although that be so, it surely is not impossible by arrangement to save such preference without the necessity of the action being prosecuted to a conclusion. That was done in the case of the Benhar Coal Company (Feb. 6, 1883, 10 R. 558), and the preference was completely sustained in that case, because the money being set aside to meet the preference, and the debt being subsequently admitted by the liquidator, there was nothing to prevent the preference being given effect to. It is quite true that in that case the company was allowed to go on and take decree in the action upon the dependence of which the arrestment was used; but we were of opinion that that was quite immaterial. I expressed myself in that action in this way,—"It was arranged between the parties by minute that these arrestments should be recalled, on condition, however, 'that any right of preference which the said George V. Turnbull may have established by the use of said diligence shall not be prejudiced, and further, that notwithstanding the said recall the respondent shall have leave to proceed with and prosecute the actions raised by him against the Benhar Coal Company, Limited, on dependence of which the said inhibitions and arrestments were used.' The consequence of this was that we pronounced an interlocutor upon the 17th February 1881, in which we recalled the diligence, but on the conditions contained in the minute which I have just referred to. Decrees are said to have been subsequently obtained by Mr Turnbull, and the date at which this was done, although not mentioned in the papers, is said to have been the 22d February 1882. It does not appear to me, however, to be of much consequence when these decrees were obtained, or even if they were obtained at all, for their only use was to establish Mr Turnbull's claim against the company—a claim which I hold to have been fully admitted —and the question, accordingly, which we have now to determine comes to be whether for these admittedly good debts any preference has been secured by the arrestments on the dependence." Accordingly, we proceeded to sustain that preference, and to decide in favour of the arresting creditor. What occurred in that case was that the arrestment was recalled. Now, after the arrestments were recalled, it is very plain that a decree in the action could never have warranted a furthcoming. The decree in the action could never have given any effect whatever to the recall of the arrestments, and therefore the decree was a mere form,—nothing else,—the debt being admitted by the liquidator. And so I think it is demonstrated that the preference secured by the arrestment on the dependence may, in a question of this kind, be fully and effectually reserved, without the necessity of any further proceedings in the action on the dependence of which it was used, if the claim in the action is either admitted or proved to be good. I am therefore of opinion that the arrestments in this case should be recalled, and that the recall will not prejudice the preference of the Australasian Company, if that preference is otherwise good.

I may mention that the case of the Glenduffhill Coal Company is a very good illustration of the way in which such preferences can be reserved. In that case there was a poinding which, of course, proceeded on an execution of a decree; but the poinding creditor was stopped before he had secured his right to the preference. He had poinded, but he had not brought the poinded goods to sale, and he was restrained from doing so, because it was thought that that might be very prejudicial to the general body of the creditors,—a sale under a poinding being notoriously a very bad sale in respect of the compulsory nature of it,—and there a preservation of the right of preference was made although the diligence was never carried into execution.

LORD MURE.—I quite agree with your Lordship on both points.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. If it had been proper for this Court when called upon to enforce or give effect to the orders of the Court in which this liquidation is going on, to inquire whether that Court had jurisdiction to grant a liquidation order, I should say that it is clear that notwithstanding the subsistence of a liquidation in Queensland there was no reason to prevent the Court in England from having an ancillary liquidation in this country—a liquidation which we see was applied for by the Queensland Company itself in order to assist the liquidation going on abroad. But I am very clearly of opinion that it is not for this Court in Scotland when asked to enforce an order from the High Court of Justice in England to enter upon any inquiry of that kind. I think we must assume that the liquidation proceedings under the Statute of 1862 and subsequent Acts are going on before a Court of competent jurisdiction, and that the order for liquidation has been properly granted by that Court. We know that in this Court it is necessary to a liquidation order that there shall be full advertisement, that there shall be full inquiry whether the company has been carrying on business in this country, and as to everything necessary in order to put the Court in a position to judge whether a liquidation order shall be granted or not. We must assume that similar proceedings go on in England also, and indeed, we have evidence to-day to the effect that that is so. But, my Lord, it appears to me that if we were to give effect to the argument here, —to inquire whether the liquidation has been properly originated, and whether the Court has jurisdiction to grant the order which we are asked to enforce, —this would involve in many cases an inquiry which would really frustrate the purposes of the Act. There is nothing more common than for the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, either in session or in vacation, to be asked to enforce in this country orders for calls which have been issued in liquidations in England, and the suggestion that on each occasion when anything of that kind is done the person against whom the call is to be enforced may come forward and offer objections to the effect that this liquidation had not properly originated in England—that the Court had no jurisdiction—that the liquidation order had been improperly granted or the like, would simply destroy the efficiency of the clauses of these Acts which are intended for the enforcement of orders granted by one Court of this Kingdom in any other part. These are questions to be determined by the Court issuing the order. And so I am clearly of opinion that the objection taken to the present application, that the Court which granted the order had no jurisdiction, is one that cannot be possibly entertained.

Then, my Lord, there remains only the merits of this question. I assume that the Court had jurisdiction in the liquidation proceedings going on before it to grant the orders which are here in question. What are these orders in substance? They are, first, that the action at the instance of the Australasian Investment Company, Limited, against the Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited, in this Court shall be stayed. Further, that the amount of the calls which have been arrested on the dependence of that action shall be paid into an account in name of the liquidator in England, a special account headed,—"Amounts received from Scotch shareholders in respect of the call made on the 14th day of December 1886," on which the Australasian Investment Company claim to have security by reason of the proceedings in the action to which I have referred; and that this payment shall be made without prejudice to the security, if any, upon those calls which the Australasian Investment Company, Limited, have obtained. And finally, there is an order upon the shareholders themselves to pay the amount of these calls into the account in England referred to in the previous order. Well then, the result of these orders is this: The Court desires the action to be stayed, it directs the money arrested to be transmitted to England and paid into an account, and orders that the shareholders shall pay that money accordingly. Now, these orders having been granted, what is the position of the liquidator when he comes to this Court? It humbly appears to me that this Court is merely administrative in what it is doing. I do not think we have any judicial functions to perform. The statute, in section 122, provides that where you have such orders issued by a Court in one part of the kingdom these shall be enforced in the same manner and in all respects as if such order had been made by the Courts that are hereby required to enforce the same. The words of the statute are, "shall be enforced"; practically, that is, shall have the same force and effect as if these orders had been pronounced in this Court itself. In cases where it may be necessary to take steps to enforce these orders as if they had been pronounced by this Court itself, section 123 provides that this Court shall take these steps. Therefore I say it is not for us to review an order which has been granted in England. Even if the order were contradictory, as is here alleged, or if it seemed to proceed upon some erroneous view of the law of Scotland, I am not prepared to say that we could interfere with that order or proceed to review it. It may be that in such circumstances the respondents would be fairly entitled to say to the Court—"There is an error in this order. It is wrong in some respects, and we desire to put it right." In these circumstances this Court might say, "We shall not give effect to the order until you have an opportunity of going back to the Court that issued the order and let them consider that question." But I think this Court is not entitled to refuse to enforce an order because of any views we may have as to whether it was a right or a wrong order. And I should have very great difficulty, so far as I am concerned, in putting the present judgment on any ground which would entitle this Court to refuse to give effect to the clear provisions of the statute, which declares that the order of a Court in England is to be equivalent to the order of a Court in this country. But, my Lord, while I entertain that view, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the respondents here are in no danger whatever from the orders which have been pronounced. I think the terms of Mr Justice North's first order directing the moneys to be paid into an account in the Bank of England are framed so as entirely to secure any preference they have, and that if they have such preference they will be clearly entitled to make it effectual. On these grounds I am of opinion with your Lordship that we should grant both petitions.

LORD ADAM.—The only difficulty that I have seen in granting the prayer of this petition is this, that it was truly not a prayer asking us to enforce an order, but simply asking us to repeat an order. I do not myself see that the petitioners will be very much in a better position by having the order they ask made; but as they think they will, I really do not see much objection to granting it. As regards the objection to the second petition, as I understand it on the merits, it was this, that whereas it was the clear intention of the Judge in the High Court in England who made the order restraining from further procedure to preserve intact the security which might have been acquired by the respondents, the effect of stopping the action here and recalling the arrestments would be de facto to destroy that security which the Court in England meant to preserve. It was said that was inconsistent, and therefore that the letter of the order should not be granted. If I thought there was anything in that, it might be worth further consideration, but I perfectly agree with your Lordship that, protected as the order is by the language used in it, the security will not be impaired in the least by the money being handed over and paid into the particular account directed by the order; and therefore I am for granting the prayer of that petition also.

THE COURT pronounced these interlocutors:—

(In the petition to enforce order)—"Restrain the respondents, the Australasian Investment Company, Limited, from further prosecuting the action at present in dependence in this Court at the instance of that company against the petitioners, the Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited, and decern, but subject to the orders of Court."

(In the petition for recall of arrestments)—"Recall the arrestments raised by the respondents against the petitioners, and decern."

The former Act further provides that where an heir has executed improvements but has died without charging the estate, any person to whom he has bequeathed his right may obtain a decree ordaining the heir in possession "to execute a bond and disposition in security" over the estate "for the amount with which the deceased heir himself might, under the provisions of this Act, have charged the estate."

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
B.

ALEXANDER LEITH, heir in entail in possession of the estates of Freefield and Glenkindie, died on 14th July 1886.

Prior to his death he had expended a sum of £1853, 4s. 10d. on improvements on the estates of the nature contemplated by the Entail Acts, but had not charged the estate with any part thereof.

By codicil to his trust-disposition he, in virtue of the powers conferred by section 11 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875,* bequeathed to his daughter Miss Georgiana Leith all right and interest competent to him to charge the entailed lands and estates of Glenkindie and Freefield with all expenditure on improvements already executed by him on the said lands and estates.

In November 1887 Miss Leith presented a petition in which she prayed the Court to ordain General Robert W. Disney Leith, the heir of entail in possession of the estates in question, to execute in favour of the petitioner a bond and disposition in security over the entailed lands, other than the mansion-house, &c., thereof, for the above-mentioned sum of £1853, 4s. 10d., or otherwise for three-fourths of the same, and for the costs thereof.

General Leith objected to the first alternative of the prayer of the petition being granted, but offered to grant a bond and disposition in security for three-fourths of the improvement debt.

On 12th June 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the sum of £1853, 4s. 10d., has been bona fide and properly expended on improvements of a permanent nature, and such as are contemplated by the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, upon the entailed lands of Glenkindie and others mentioned in the petition, by the deceased Alexander Leith (tertius), while heir of entail in possession of said lands, and that the petitioner is in right thereof in virtue of a codicil to the trust-disposition and settlement of the said Alexander Leith, dated 21st December 1883, whereby he expressly bequeathed and conveyed the same to her: Decerns and ordains the respondent, General Robert William Disney Leith, the heir of entail now in possession of the said lands, to execute in favour of the petitioner, or of any other person she may think fit, a bond and disposition in security over the said lands other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, for £1853, 4s. 10d., together with the sum of £136, 14s. 10d., being the estimated cost of the application, and obtaining the loan, and granting security therefor, the said two sums amounting together to the sum of £1989, 19s. 8d." †

* Sec. 11 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, enacts,—"Where any heir of entail in possession of an estate in Scotland, holden by virtue of a tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1848 shall have executed improvements on such estate of the nature contemplated by this or any other Entail Act as the case may be, and shall have died after the passing of this Act without having charged the estate with the amount which he is entitled to charge of the sums expended on such improvements, it shall be lawful for any person to whom such heir of entail may have expressly bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned such sums, or any part thereof, to make application by summary petition to the Court, praying the Court, after such inquiry as to the Court shall seem proper, to find and declare that the sums specified in the petition, or any part thereof, have been expended on improvements on the said estate by the deceased heir of entail; and that the petitioner is in right thereof; and to decern and ordain the heir in possession of such entailed estate to execute in favour of the petitioner, or of any other person such petitioner may think fit, a bond and disposition in security over the said estate other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or over some sufficient portion of the said estate other than as aforesaid, for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might, under the provisions of this Act, have charged the estate . . . ."

† "NOTE.—The late Alexander Leith was at his death the heir of entail in possession of the lands of Glenkindie and others, and had prior to his death expended a sum of £1853, 4s. 10d. in improvements on the entailed estates, which he would have been entitled to charge thereon under the provisions of the Entail Acts. He expressly bequeathed to the petitioner the said sum, and assigned to her the right and interest competent to him to charge the entailed estates therewith. She now petitions the Court to ordain the heir of entail in possession to execute in her favour a bond and disposition in security over the entailed estate (except the mansion-house and policies), for the foresaid sum. The heir of entail in possession objects to the prayer of the petition being granted, but is ready to grant bond for three-fourths of the said improvement debt, which, he maintains, is all the petitioner can demand.

"The determination of the question between the parties depends upon the construction of the 8th and 11th sections of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875. By the 11th section it is provided that any person in the position of the petitioner is entitled to the order or decree of the Court ordaining the heir of entail in possession to execute in his or her favour a bond and disposition in security over the estate, other than the mansion-house, &c., 'for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might under the provisions of this Act have charged the estate.'

"By the 8th section power is given to an heir of entail to charge the estate with improvement expenditure in one or other of two modes. He may charge the estate with the full amount of his expenditure by means of a bond of annualrent, under which the whole expenditure and interest will be paid off in twenty-five years, or he may grant bond and disposition in security in common form for three-fourths of the amount of the improvement expenditure.

"The respondent now contends that as the heir, while in possession could not have charged the estate with a bond and disposition in security for more than three-fourths of the improvement expenditure, so now his assignee or representative is not entitled to a bond and disposition in security over the estate for any larger amount. The question is not, however, what the heir while in possession could charge by way of bond and disposition in security, but what he could charge in any way; the statute providing that the assignee of the deceased heir is entitled to a bond, 'for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might have charged the estate.' If he could competently have charged the estates in any mode with the whole expenditure, his representative or assignee is now entitled to have that done. The measure of the assignee's right is the amount which the deceased heir could have charged upon the estates irrespective of the mode in which that charge was made.

"The respondent maintains that charging the estate with an annualrent is not charging the estate with the expenditure itself. In my opinion the distinction thus drawn is not a good or sound distinction. The bond of annualrent (Jurid. Styles, i. 440) proceeds upon the narrative that the heir charging has received from the person in whose favour the bond is granted the full amount of the expenditure, which sum he binds himself and the heirs of entail to repay, with interest, in twenty-five years, by half-yearly payments of fixed amount; and in security of these payments the entailed estates are conveyed. The whole expenditure is thus charged upon the estates, whenever the bond of annualrent is granted or recorded. No doubt the right of the creditor in one case is limited to insist on repayment of his debt by certain instalments, while in the other he may at once demand payment of his debt in full. But that difference in the right of the creditor does not affect the fact that under the bond of annualrent the heir of entail had validly charged the entailed estates with the full amount of the improvement expenditure; and if he could do that his assignee is entitled to have it done in her favour. This can only be done by means of a bond and disposition in security, for the Act has so prescribed."

* Sec. 8 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, enacts,—"It shall be lawful for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland . . . (notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary contained in the tailzie), who has obtained the authority of the Court to borrow money under this Act on the security of the estate, to charge the fee and rents of such estate other than the provements could only grant a bond and disposition in security for three-fourths of the amount. The petitioner could not have any higher right than her author. When a bond of annualrent was granted for the full amount of the expenditure, that was not the same thing as charging the estate with the whole amount of the expenditure. A bond and disposition in security formed a permanent burden on the estate, whereas a bond of annualrent imposed the burden of repaying the principal upon the heir in possession himself and his immediate successors or successor within the next twenty-five years.

Argued for the petitioner;—The heir of entail had power to charge the entailed estate with the full amount of the expenditure in virtue of sec. 11 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, and the petitioner as his representative had the same right. It did not matter how the heir could charge the full amount so long as he could do so at all. The estate was really as much "charged" when a bond of annualrent was granted over it as when a bond and disposition in security was granted. That the petitioner could only charge the estate by bond and disposition was merely a matter of form, the amount to which he could charge it being the amount to which the heir himself might have charged it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioner in this case is the legatee of the last heir of entail in possession of certain estates, and her legacy consists of sums expended by the last heir on improvements on the estates, which were not constituted or made burdens on the lands during his lifetime. That legacy was left under the authority of section 11 of the Entail Act of 1875, and the demand made upon the present heir is that he shall execute in favour of the petitioner a bond and disposition in security for the whole amount of the improvement expenditure. The heir in possession, on the other hand, contends that the petitioner is not entitled to a bond for the whole amount, but only for three-fourths thereof. The determination of the question depends on the construction of section 11 of the Act, taken in combination with section 8.

Section 11 provides,—"Where any heir of entail in possession of an estate in Scotland, holden by virtue of a tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1848, shall have executed improvements on such estate of the nature contemplated by this or any other Entail Act as the case may be, and shall have died after the passing of this Act without having charged the estate with the amount which he is entitled to charge of the sums expended on such improvements, it shall be lawful for any person to whom such heir of entail may have expressly bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned such sums, or any part thereof, to make application by summary petition to the Court, praying the Court, after such assigned to her the right and interest competent to him to charge the entailed estates therewith. She now petitions the Court to ordain the heir of entail in possession to execute in her favour a bond and disposition in security over the entailed estate (except the mansion-house and policies), for the foresaid sum. The heir of entail in possession objects to the prayer of the petition being granted, but is ready to grant bond for three-fourths of the said improvement debt, which, he maintains, is all the petitioner can demand.

Leith v. Leith.

General Leith reclaimed, and argued;—Under sec. 8 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875,* the heir in possession who executed the im-

"The determination of the question between the parties depends upon the construction of the 8th and 11th sections of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875. By the 11th section it is provided that any person in the position of the petitioner is entitled to the order or decree of the Court ordaining the heir of entail in possession to execute in his or her favour a bond and disposition in security over the estate, other than the mansion-house, &c., 'for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might under the provisions of this Act have charged the estate.'

"By the 8th section power is given to an heir of entail to charge the estate with improvement expenditure in one or other of two modes. He may charge the estate with the full amount of his expenditure by means of a bond of annualrent, under which the whole expenditure and interest will be paid off in twenty-five years, or he may grant bond and disposition in security in common form for three-fourths of the amount of the improvement expenditure.

"The respondent now contends that as the heir, while in possession could not have charged the estate with a bond and disposition in security for more than three-fourths of the improvement expenditure, so now his assignee or representative is not entitled to a bond and disposition in security over the estate for any larger amount. The question is not, however, what the heir while in possession could charge by way of bond and disposition in security, but what he could charge in any way; the statute providing that the assignee of the deceased heir is entitled to a bond, 'for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might have charged the estate.' If he could competently have charged the estates in any mode with the whole expenditure, his representative or assignee is now entitled to have that done. The measure of the assignee's right is the amount which the deceased heir could have charged upon the estates irrespective of the mode in which that charge was made.

"The respondent maintains that charging the estate with an annualrent is not charging the estate with the expenditure itself. In my opinion the distinction thus drawn is not a good or sound distinction. The bond of annualrent (Jurid. Styles, i. 440) proceeds upon the narrative that the heir charging has received from the person in whose favour the bond is granted the full amount of the expenditure, which sum he binds himself and the heirs of entail to repay, with interest, in twenty-five years, by half-yearly payments of fixed amount; and in security of these payments the entailed estates are conveyed. The whole expenditure is thus charged upon the estates, whenever the bond of annualrent is granted or recorded. No doubt the right of the creditor in one case is limited to insist on repayment of his debt by certain instalments, while in the other he may at once demand payment of his debt in full. But that difference in the right of the creditor does not affect the fact that under the bond of annualrent the heir of entail had validly charged the entailed estates with the full amount of the improvement expenditure; and if he could do that his assignee is entitled to have it done in her favour. This can only be done by means of a bond and disposition in security, for the Act has so prescribed."

* Sec. 8 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, enacts,—"It shall be lawful for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland . . . (notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary contained in the tailzie), who has obtained the authority of the Court to borrow money under this Act on the security of the estate, to charge the fee and rents of such estate other than the

provements could only grant a bond and disposition in security for three-fourths of the amount. The petitioner could not have any higher right than her author. When a bond of annualrent was granted for the full amount of the expenditure, that was not the same thing as charging the estate with the whole amount of the expenditure. A bond and disposition in security formed a permanent burden on the estate, whereas a bond of annualrent imposed the burden of repaying the principal upon the heir in possession himself and his immediate successors or successor within the next twenty-five years.

Argued for the petitioner;—The heir of entail had power to charge the entailed estate with the full amount of the expenditure in virtue of sec. 11 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, and the petitioner as his representative had the same right. It did not matter how the heir could charge the full amount so long as he could do so at all. The estate was really as much "charged" when a bond of annualrent was granted over it as when a bond and disposition in security was granted. That the petitioner could only charge the estate by bond and disposition was merely a matter of form, the amount to which he could charge it being the amount to which the heir himself might have charged it.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioner in this case is the legatee of the last heir of entail in possession of certain estates, and her legacy consists of sums expended by the last heir on improvements on the estates, which were not constituted or made burdens on the lands during his lifetime. That legacy was left under the authority of section 11 of the Entail Act of 1875, and the demand made upon the present heir is that he shall execute in favour of the petitioner a bond and disposition in security for the whole amount of the improvement expenditure. The heir in possession, on the other hand, contends that the petitioner is not entitled to a bond for the whole amount, but only for three-fourths thereof. The determination of the question depends on the construction of section 11 of the Act, taken in combination with section 8.

Section 11 provides,—"Where any heir of entail in possession of an estate in Scotland, holden by virtue of a tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1848, shall have executed improvements on such estate of the nature contemplated by this or any other Entail Act as the case may be, and shall have died after the passing of this Act without having charged the estate with the amount which he is entitled to charge of the sums expended on such improvements, it shall be lawful for any person to whom such heir of entail may have expressly bequeathed, conveyed, or assigned such sums, or any part thereof, to make application by summary petition to the Court, praying the Court, after such inquiry as to the Court shall seem proper, to find and declare that the sums specified in the petition, or any part thereof, have been expended on improvements on the said estate by the deceased heir of entail; and that the petitioner is in right thereof; and to decern and ordain the heir in possession of such entailed estate to execute in favour of the petitioner, or of any other person such petitioner may think fit, a bond and disposition in security over the said estate other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or over some sufficient portion of the said estate other than as aforesaid, for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might, under the provisions of this Act, have charged the estate . . ." Under that section the only way in which the estate is to be charged is by bond and disposition in security. Now, there is no doubt that the heir of entail in possession could himself only grant a bond and disposition in security for three-fourths of the amount of the expenditure; but the petitioner contends that she is entitled to have a bond and disposition for the whole sum, because the heir in possession might have made the whole sum a charge in the form of a bond of annualrent. Now, it appears to me that there is rather a fallacy in that argument. A bond and disposition in security makes a charge on the estate of a permanent nature. It may be paid off, but till that is done it is of a permanent nature. A bond of annualrent has a totally different effect, for it necessarily comes to an end under the statute in twenty-five years, it is extinguished by the payment of annual instalments, or, in other words, of annualrent.

That leads us to consider the terms of section 8, which confers on the heir of entail in possession the right to execute either a bond and disposition in security for a proportion of the whole, or a bond of annualrent sufficient to repay the whole. That section enacts,—"It shall be lawful for an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in Scotland . . . (notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary contained in the tailzie), who has obtained the authority of the Court to borrow money under this Act on the security of the estate, to charge the fee and rents of such estate other than the mansion-house, offices, and policies thereof, or the fee and rents of any portion of such estate other than as aforesaid, with a bond of annualrent, binding himself and his heirs of tailzie to make payment of an annualrent for twenty-five years from and after the date of such authority of the Court; . . . such annualrent to be payable by equal moieties half-yearly, and to be at a rate not exceeding £7, 2s. per annum for every £100 so authorised to be borrowed, and so in proportion for any greater or less sum; or where the improvements were executed before the date of the application to the Court, in the option of such heir in possession, and in lieu of such bond of annualrent, with a bond and disposition in security over such estate or any portion thereof, other than as aforesaid, for two-thirds" (altered by the Entail Act 1882, sec. 6, to three-fourths) "of the sum on which the amount of such bond of annualrent, if granted, would be calculated, in terms of this Act." That is the alternative presented to the heir of entail. One cannot help seeing why in the one case the heir is allowed to charge only three-fourths, and in the other the whole of the expenditure. It is simply this, that a bond and disposition in security is a permanent burden, whereas the annualrent is always working itself off by instalments. The consequence of that is, that in one case the heir when he dies leaves the estate burdened permanently, whereas when a bond of annualrent is granted he is during his own lifetime paying the instalments, and so extinguishing the debt and not merely paying the interest. It might very well happen that the heir who granted such a bond might live until the whole had been paid off;—at all events, in the ordinary case, if I may use the phrase, a good deal of principal and interest is paid off by the heir who granted the bond, and so the estate is relieved to that extent. That, I think, accounts for the difference made by the statute.

Now, in this case a bond of annualrent cannot be granted—the statute says the charge shall be made by bond and disposition. The reason of that is obvious, for the lady could never pay off any part of the debt;—therefore when the statute says that a bond and disposition is to be the form of the charge it is necessarily implied that it can only be demanded to the extent to which the heir of entail himself could have granted it had he himself charged the estate. I am therefore sorry that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in this case, and that, in my opinion, the bond must be restricted to three-fourths of the amount of the expenditure.

LORD MURE.—This is a purely statutory matter, and I am unable to find any words in the statute which give this legatee a right to what she asks in this petition. I therefore agree that the present heir of entail is only bound to grant a bond and disposition in security for three-fourths of the sum actually expended. The 8th section is the one to which we are tied down, as section 11 refers back to that section as to what the heir himself could have done. In that section the heir of entail is given power to grant a bond and disposition in security for two-thirds (now three-fourths) of the whole amount, or he can grant a bond of annualrent for the whole. But persons in the position of the petitioner are given no power in section 11 to insist on a bond of annualrent being granted, and therefore she can only insist on such a bond and disposition as the heir of entail himself could have granted—that is, for three-fourths of the total amount of the expenditure.

LORD ADAM.—The Lord Ordinary finds and declares that the sum of £1853, 4s. 10d. has been properly expended on improvements on the estate, and ordains the present heir of entail in possession to execute a bond and disposition in security for the whole of that sum in favour of the petitioner, or of any other person she may think fit. The question for us to decide is, whether the heir is bound to do so, or whether he is only bound to grant a bond for three-fourths of the sum in question. That question depends on the construction of section 11 of the Act of 1875, which provides that the Court may "ordain the heir in possession to execute in favour of the petitioner . . . a bond and disposition in security over the estate . . . for the amount with which the deceased heir of entail himself might have charged the estate"—that is, I should have thought, by bond and disposition in security. I should have thought that to be the reasonable meaning of the section, and accordingly that the petitioner was only bound to grant a bond and disposition in security for two-thirds of the expenditure, or, by subsequent statute, for three-fourths of the whole. But it is said that it was in the power of the heir of entail in possession to charge the whole of the expenditure by bond of annualrent, and that if the heir had in any way power to charge the whole expenditure, then that the petitioner has a right to demand a bond and disposition for the whole.

That takes us back to the 8th section, by which the power to charge is given to the heir of entail in possession.

No. 170.
July 18, 1888.
Leith v. Leith.

Now, that section authorises the heir of entail to charge the fee and rents of the estate with a bond of annualrent, binding himself and his heirs of tailzie to make payment of an annualrent for twenty-five years,—such annualrent to be payable half-yearly, and to be at a rate not exceeding £7, 2s. per annum for every £100 expended on the estate, or otherwise with a bond and disposition in security for two-thirds (now three-fourths) of the amount expended.

The amount expended therefore forms the basis upon which the amount of annualrent is calculated. But does an heir of entail by executing a bond of annualrent charge the estate with the amount on which the bond is calculated? If that is the effect, then the petitioner may be right in this case, but if the effect is simply to charge the estate with the amount of the half-yearly payments as they periodically recur, then the petitioner cannot succeed. I have no doubt that the effect of the granting of a bond of annualrent is not to charge the estate with the amount on which the bond is calculated but only with the sums as they periodically become due. A person in right of such a bond could take no proceedings so as to affect the fee or rents of the estate for anything more. It is in the power of the heir of entail, when he has obtained authority to charge the estate, to go into the market with the bond of annualrent and to sell it at any price he can get. He is not bound to sell it for the amount on which the annualrent has been calculated. If money is cheap at the time he will probably get a larger sum for the bond than the amount of the expenditure; if money is dear he may get less. The sum, in short, which he gets for it may not be the same as the sum on which the bond is calculated, and in no sense does the bond of annualrent charge the estate with the amount of the improvement expenditure.

I cannot help thinking the Lord Ordinary has been misled by the quotation he makes from the Juridical Styles. He says,—"The bond of annualrent (Jurid. Styles, i. 440) proceeds upon the narrative that the heir charging has received from the person in whose favour the bond is granted the full amount of the expenditure, which sum he binds himself and the heirs of entail to repay, with interest, in twenty-five years, by half-yearly payments of fixed amount; and in security of these payments the entailed estates are conveyed. The whole expenditure is thus charged upon the estates, whenever the bond of annualrent is granted or recorded." Now, I have already said that it does not follow that the price paid for the bond of annualrent represents the amount of the expenditure, and I may further remark that under the statute the charging heir has no power to bind the succeeding heirs to repay anything. He may, of course, bind himself as he pleases, but he can only bind the succeeding heirs to pay a certain annualrent. He cannot bind them to pay any principal sum, nor can he convey the estate in security of the repayment of any principal sum. With all deference to the learned book to which the Lord Ordinary refers, I do not think that there is there set forth the true nature of a bond of annualrent. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the heir of entail could not have charged, by bond of annualrent, the estate with the full amount of the expenditure, and if that is so, the petitioner here can only insist on the present heir granting a bond and disposition in security for three-fourths of the whole amount. It is not a reasonable construction of the statute that it was intended to give the disponee or legatee greater powers than the granter had himself. It cannot have been the intention of the Legislature to put it in the power of an heir of entail, by delaying or abstaining from charging the estate during his own lifetime, to enable his legatee to charge the estate and succeeding heirs with a larger sum than he himself could have done. There seems to be no reason why the next heir or the estate should be bound to pay the whole amount of the expenditure in the one case and not in the other.

I am therefore of opinion that authority should be granted to charge the estate with only three-fourths of the amount.

LORD SHAND was absent.

On 18th July the petitioner moved that the costs of the application should be included in the charge upon the estate.

General Leith objected, and maintained that only three-fourths of the costs should be allowed.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that subsection 6 of the 7th section and section 8 of the Act of 1875 must be taken together, but I think that in the 8th section is to be found the conclusive answer to the question before us.

The 6th subsection of sec. 7 provides that "in every case the Court shall, in fixing the amount to be borrowed under their authority, add to the actual or estimated amount of the cost of the improvements the actual or estimated amount of the cost of the application and the proceedings therein, and of obtaining the loan and granting security therefor."

Now, that subsection directs that the two sums—the cost of the improvements and the cost of the application—are to be added together. The 8th section in dealing with the amount to be charged says,—that where a bond and disposition in security is granted, it is to be for two-thirds (now three-fourths) "of the sum on which the amount of such bond of annualrent if granted would be calculated." Now, the amount of annualrent would be calculated on the aggregate sums consisting of the cost of the improvements and the expenses, but section 8 says that the bond and disposition in security is to be granted for only three-fourths of that aggregate. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that the expenses form part of the sum so dealt with, and that in the case of granting a bond and disposition in security over an estate the heir of entail must be content with charging three-fourths of the expenses.

LORD MURE.—I am clearly of the same opinion.

LORD SHAND.—The expenses which must be incurred must be the same whether what is ultimately charged on the estate is the whole of the amount or only three-fourths of it, and I confess that if I could have found any reading of the statute which would have enabled me to regard the whole of the expenses of the application as a proper charge on the estate, I should have been glad to adopt it, for I see no reason for cutting down the expenses in such an application as this, when the whole amount of expenses is allowed in every other application by an heir of entail under the statutes. I agree, however, that the words of the 8th section are too strong, and that we must only allow three-fourths of the expenses here.

LORD ADAM.—I have no difficulty in concurring.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall said interlocutor in so far as it decerns and ordains the respondent (reclaimer), the heir of entail now in possession of the lands of Glenkindie and others mentioned in the petition, to execute in favour of the petitioner, or of any other person she may think fit, Church—Seat rents in parochial church in burgh—Annuity-tax (Edinburgh and Montrose) Abolition Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. c. 50), secs. 5, 6—Annuity-tax Abolition Act Amendment Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 87), secs. 25, 32—St Giles' Edinburgh Ancient Church Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. ccxxi.).—By the Act 23 and 24 Vict. c. 50, the rights of administration and custody of the parochial churches in Edinburgh were transferred from the Magistrates and Council to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Act directed that "the pews or seats in the said several churches" should be let at the sight of the respective kirk-sessions, and that the moneys received by them for "pew or seat rents" should be paid to the Commissioners.

In 1879 the congregation of the High Kirk occupied the ancient church of St Giles, with the exception of the nave, which was separated from the rest of the building by partition walls, and was occupied as the church of West St Giles' parish.

Under the Act 42 and 43 Vict. c. ccxxi., which was passed for the purpose of restoring the ancient church of St Giles according to its original design, another church was provided for the congregation of West St Giles', and the vacant church was incorporated with the High Kirk, the partition walls and the church seats being removed. The addition, forming the nave of the restored church, was left without pews or seats. In consequence, however, of the increase of the congregation the kirk-session of the High Kirk placed chairs in the nave, which were let to individuals in the same way as the other seats.

Held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the right of the Commissioners to the seat rents extended to the rents of chairs placed in the nave by the kirk-session.

I.

THE present action was raised by the Edinburgh Ecclesiastical Commissioners, incorporated under the Act 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 50, entituled "An Act to abolish the annuity-tax in Edinburgh and Montrose, and to make provision in regard to the stipends of the ministers in that city and burgh," against the Kirk-session of the High Kirk of Edinburgh for declarator that the defenders were bound, in terms of the Statutes 23 and 24 Vict. c. 50 (Annuity-Tax Abolition Act Amendment Act, 1870), 33 and 34 Vict. c. 87, and St Giles' Edinburgh Ancient Church Act, 1879, 42 and 43 Vict. c. ccxxi., "to pay over to the said pursuers the whole moneys levied and received by them, or that shall hereafter be levied and received by them as rents for seats in the said High Kirk, including therein the area of the church formerly known as the Old Church, and the area of the church formerly known as the New North Church or West St Giles' Church, now incorporated with the said High Kirk, and forming part of it, and that without any deductions whatever: And that the defenders" should be ordained to exhibit and produce "a full and particular account of the whole seat rents levied and received by them, and of their intromissions therewith from the date at which the said West St Giles' Church was incorporated with the said High Kirk, and became part thereof, whereby the true amount due by the said defenders to the said pursuers may appear and be ascertained, . . . and to exhibit and produce annually hereafter to the said pursuers a full and particular account of the whole seat rents levied and received by them, and of their intromissions with the same." The subsequent conclusions were ultimately withdrawn.

The action was brought in the following circumstances:—Section 5 of the Annuity-Tax Abolition Act, 1860, enacted,—"The whole rights of administration and custody as respects the following parochial churches in the city of Edinburgh, viz." (here followed a list of the city churches, including the High Kirk, Old Kirk, and the New North Church), "which the Magistrates and Council have in or pertaining to the same or any of them . . . shall be, and the same are hereby from and after the 11th day of November 1860, transferred from the Magistrates and Council and vested in the Commissioners for the like public uses and purposes, and under the like conditions for and under which the said churches are at present administered by the Magistrates and Council, provided that nothing in this Act shall prevent the Magistrates and Council from causing the bells of said churches to be rung on suitable public occasions."

Section 6—"The pews or seats in the said several churches shall, from and after the 11th day of November 1860, be let by or at the sight of the kirk-session of each church respectively, with the exception of not less than one-tenth of the number, which shall be reserved as free sittings, but subject to any directions which the Commissioners may issue from time to time, and subject also to any rights or conditions presently attaching to such pews or seats, or in case the Commissioners shall think it necessary or expedient, by or at the sight of the Commissioners or their secretary, and at such rents for the said pews or seats as the Commissioners, subject always to the rights and conditions aforesaid, may from time to time determine or approve with reference to the circumstances of the said churches respectively." The kirk-session were directed to lay the accounts before the Commissioners, and to pay the amount received to them after deducting certain church expenses, but the clause allowing this deduction was repealed by the Act 33 and 34 Vict. c. 87.

At the date of the Act the three congregations of the churches above mentioned occupied portions of the ancient church of St Giles, which were separated from each other by partition walls. The eastmost of these portions was called the High Kirk, and was the parish church of the High Kirk Parish of Edinburgh. The south transept was known as the Old Kirk, and was the church of the Old Kirk Parish. The nave or western end was known as the New North or West St Giles' Church, and was the parish church of the New North Parish.

By the Annuity-Tax Abolition Act Amendment Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 87), sec. 19, it was enacted, inter alia, that the Old Kirk should cease to be a charge endowed by law, but provided that nothing in the Act should prevent its being subsequently re-endowed from voluntary sources as a quoad sacra church. Subsequently the Old Kirk ceased to be occupied as a church. Thereafter the partition between it and the High Kirk was removed, and its area was seated as an addition to the High Kirk.

Edinburgh Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kirk-Session of High Kirk, Edinburgh.

In 1879 an offer was made by Dr William Chambers to complete the restoration of St Giles' on certain conditions, and as a result of the negotiations an Act of Parliament was applied for and obtained "to make provision in regard to the restoration of the ancient church of St Giles in the city of Edinburgh" (42 and 43 Vict. cap. ccxxi.).

The Act, on the narrative that by the Annuity-Tax Abolition Act, 1860, the whole rights of administration and custody of West St Giles' Church had been transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and that that Act had been amended by the Act of 1870, "and whereas at the passing of the last recited Act the ancient church of St Giles . . . was divided, for congregational purposes, by walls, which formed no part of the original structure, into three distinct churches, viz.: (1) the choir or High Kirk, (2) the southern transept or Old Kirk, and (3) the nave or New North Church (usually called West St Giles' Church); and whereas the part of the building forming the southern transept thereof and formerly known as the Old Kirk has now been added to and incorporated with the High Kirk, the dividing walls between them having been removed; and whereas it is now proposed that a complete restoration of the said ancient church should be effected, so that it shall form, as originally designed, one undivided building, and for this purpose it is necessary that the New North Church (usually called West St Giles' Church) should cease to be occupied as a separate place of worship, the dividing walls between it and the other parts of the said ancient church being removed, and provision being made for the erection of a suitable church for the congregation presently worshipping there, and for all other vested rights therein; be it therefore enacted . . . . Sec. 1. Whenever, as the result of public voluntary subscription or of contributions from any source other than municipal funds or revenues, there shall be paid over to the Edinburgh Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or when security shall be found, to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners, for the sum of £10,500, to be applied as hereinafter provided, the congregation at present worshipping in the New North Church (usually called West St Giles' Church) shall, within twelve months from the date of such payment or acceptance of such security, vacate the said New North Church (usually called West St Giles' Church), which shall thereupon be incorporated with and form part of the High Kirk." Section 2 provided that the commissioners should spend £10,000 of the £10,500 mentioned in the preceding section on the purchase of a site, and the erection thereon of a church, as should be approved by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, in lieu of West St Giles' Church, and should invest the remaining £500, "the interest whereof shall be accumulated and applied pro tanto in the maintenance of the fabric of that part of the building presently occupied by the said New North Church, usually called West St Giles', but declaring that nothing herein contained shall limit the obligation of the said Edinburgh Ecclesiastical Commissioners to maintain the fabric of the whole building as provided by the said recited Acts." Section 6 provided that the Act should be construed and read along with and as part of the recited Acts.

After the passing of the Act the partition wall between West St Giles' and the rest of the building was taken down, and the area thus thrown into one with the areas of the High and Old Kirks was restored according to the plans of the Restoration Committee. In accordance with these plans no pews or seats were placed in the area of West St Giles', which formed the nave of the church.

For a short time before the work was completed the High Kirk congregation met in this area of West St Giles', and the kirk-session provided chairs in that area during that time. These chairs were in rows with a beam of wood passing beneath them, to which they were fastened. They remained when the congregation again returned to the High Kirk, and in consequence of the increase in the congregation they were used by strangers and others who attended the services of St Giles'.

In consequence of the kirk-session disputing the right of the Commissioners to demand payment of the sums received for the use of the chairs, the present action was raised.

The pursuers averred with reference to the chairs in the area of West St Giles':—"The portion of the said High Church, which formerly was the New North or West St Giles' Church, was after its incorporation with the High Kirk, furnished by the defenders, or under their directions, with chairs or seats. These chairs are placed in rows, and are fastened together in each row by a beam of wood passing underneath them. The same portion of the area has always been occupied by these seats. The defenders have, ever since this part of the church was so furnished, received rents from persons for the right of occupying these seats, in the same way as for the pews and seats in other parts of the High Kirk. The statements in the defenders' answers are denied. These seats have been let in the same way, and at the same rates, as the other seats in the High Kirk. A uniform rate was charged, and the rate for the seats in question was collected at the same time as the ordinary seat rents. The chairs were numbered, and each person paying the rate fixed by the defenders obtained a receipt or ticket, giving him the same exclusive right to a particular chair as a seatholder had to his seat. The chairs so paid for were reserved for the persons making these payments in the same way as the other seats in the church were reserved for seatholders."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In terms of the statutes referred to, viz., 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 50, 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 87, and 42 and 43 Vict. cap. 221, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator, count, reckoning, and payment as craved. (2) The defenders having occupied with seats the areas which formerly were the areas of the Old Church and the New North or West St Giles' Church, but are now part of the area of the High Kirk, are bound, in terms of the statutes referred to, to let the said seats, and to account to the pursuers for the sums received by them therefor.

The defenders averred that in respect of the accommodation provided by the chairs "the chairholders gave a donation or subscription to the funds of the church. The defenders did not themselves intromit with these donations or subscriptions, but handed them over to the committee of the congregation which takes charge of the finances of the church. That committee issues a report annually, which is printed and circulated, and which, in the account charge and discharge always appended, contains an entry 'Donations from members for the use of chairs.' No one was allowed the use of a chair in this way until every pew or seat in the High Church which the pursuers could let was occupied and the rent paid to the pursuers."

They further stated that in consequence of the throwing open of the entire building, and the large congregation which met in the area of it, the expenses of the congregation had been largely increased in respect of assistants to the minister, choir expenses, &c.; that the donations derived from the chairholders were applied to meet those expenses, of which, however, they did not amount to one-fifth part.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The statements of the pursuers are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the defenders are bound to pay over to the pursuers the whole moneys levied and received by them, or that shall be levied or received by them, as rents for seats in the High Kirk of the city of Edinburgh, including therein the area of the church formerly known as the Old Church, and the area of the church formerly known as the New North Church or West St Giles' Church, now incorporated with the said High Kirk, and forming part thereof, and that without any deductions whatever: Decerns and ordains the said defenders to exhibit and produce annually hereafter to the said pursuers a full and particular account of the whole seat rents levied and received by them, and of their intromissions with the same: Appoints the case to be put to the roll for further procedure, and reserves all questions of expenses."*

* "OPINION.—From the correspondence produced by the parties, and founded upon in the record, it appears that the dispute between the pursuers and the defenders originally was restricted to the point as to whether the pursuers were entitled to demand from the defenders an account of the rents or donations that they received for the use of chairs supplied to persons who occupied them in the area of the old West St Giles' Church. The defenders maintained that these were donations which they were entitled to apply in defraying the general expenses of the congregation, and which they were not bound to account for to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in terms of the Act 23 and 24 Victoria, cap. 50, sec. 6. But the subject of dispute has been enlarged after the parties came into Court under this action; and now it is maintained that not merely are the defenders not bound to account for the sums they receive for the use of the chairs in the area of West St Giles' Church, but also for the rents that they obtain from the pews located in the area of the Old Kirk. The pleas in law stated for the defenders do not bring out distinctly the subjects in dispute—their only plea in law, upon which they maintained the discussion before the Lord Ordinary, being simply that the pursuers' action is not relevant.

"I. As regards the Old Kirk, the matter stands as follows:—By the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 87, sec. 19, it is enacted that 'it shall not be competent to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or to any patron or patrons, or to any presbytery, to nominate or present a minister to any of the five churches or charges specified in section 21 of the said Act 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 50, or to the parish of New Canongate, and the said churches and charges and the said parish of New Canongate shall not be provided with ministers, or otherwise maintained as churches and charges endowed by law.' Among the churches and charges so referred to in the Act 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 50, sec. 21, was included the Old Church. Thus the Old Church became extinguished. It was no longer to be provided with ministers or maintained as a charge endowed by law. Provision was made by 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 87, sec. 19, for the erection of the Old Church as a parish quoad sacra, on a sufficient endowment being procured for it to the satisfaction of the Teind Court; and such endowment having been procured, and a church having been built, the Court assigned a district, erecting it into a quoad sacra parish under the name of the Old Church Parish, Edinburgh (Stevenson and Others v. MacNair and Others, 24th November 1879, 7 R. 270). The erection of this into a quoad sacra parish has no bearing upon the questions now to be determined, and is here merely referred to for the purpose of indicating the ultimate fate of the Old Kirk parish.

"The fabric of the church itself, after being temporarily occupied, with the consent of the pursuers—the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—by another congregation, was disused as a church, and it was in this condition when the Act of Parliament 42 and 43 Victoria, cap. 221, was passed in the year 1879, which is an Act to 'make provision in regard to the restoration of the ancient church of St Giles in the city of Edinburgh.' This Act has a preamble which is important. It recites the Statute 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 50, and then it narrates that the ancient church of St Giles had been 'divided for congregational purposes, by walls which formed no part of the original structure, into three distinct churches, viz. (1) the choir or High Kirk; (2) the southern transept or Old Kirk; and (3) the nave or New North Church (usually called West St Giles'

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was only one legal way of adding to a parish church, viz., by a legal process. The Act of 1879

Church), and then it thus proceeds,—'And whereas the part of the building forming the southern transept thereof, and formerly known as the Old Kirk, has now been added to and incorporated with the High Kirk, the dividing walls between them having been removed,' and then the statute proceeds to deal with West St Giles' Church area, and with provisions for turning the whole fabric into one church, which will be referred to immediately. Thus at the date of this statute in 1879 the dividing wall between the Old Kirk and the High Kirk had been removed; and incorporation, as the statute says, thereby made with the High Kirk. There was thus constituted, not two, but one church in point of fact. What was the effect of this upon the legal right of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as regards the pew rents of the incorporated kirks? The case in fact and in law was just the same as if an addition had been built to the High Kirk. Their right to the pews in such additional building could not have been disputed, nor can there be any distinction drawn between such a case and what happened. The fabric of the Old Kirk was made separate from the rest of the ancient kirk of St Giles simply by the wall, and when the wall was removed there was just one church. Accordingly the parties so arranged matters. On the area of the Old Kirk fabric pews were placed, and the rents derived from them were regularly paid to the pursuers. It is only since this dispute as to the chairs in West St Giles' area has arisen that it has occurred to the defenders to take up the position that the statement in the Act of Parliament is wrong, when it declares that the Old Kirk area is incorporated with the High Kirk, and that the physical removal of the wall does not legally incorporate the two, and that some process is necessary before that can be accomplished. The Lord Ordinary is not aware of any process that would effect this purpose, and none was suggested by the defenders. He therefore prefers the interpretation which the defenders and all parties put upon the matter, by holding that there was here an incorporation; and that consequently the pursuers are entitled, in terms of their conclusions, to levy rents for pews in the area of the church formerly known as the Old Church.

"II. As regards West St Giles', the question turns upon the construction to be put upon the Act of 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 221). This Act was passed in order to enable the restoration of the whole ancient church of St Giles to be carried out in accordance with the generous scheme of William Chambers. By that scheme no interference was to be made with the High Kirk; and the Old Kirk, as we have seen, had been incorporated with the High Kirk. But there was a congregation worshipping in West St Giles' which it was necessary to buy out. The preamble of the statute narrates the necessity for this in order that the ancient church should all be restored as originally designed. It was necessary according to that preamble that provision should be 'made for the erection of a suitable church for the congregation presently worshipping there.' The first section of the statute enacts as follows,—'Whenever, as the result of public voluntary subscription or of contributions from any source other than municipal funds or revenues, there shall be paid over to the Edinburgh Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or when security shall be found to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners for the sum of ten thousand five hundred pounds sterling, to be applied as hereinafter provided, the congregation at present worshipping in the New North Church (usually called West St Giles' Church), shall, within twelve months from the date of such payment or acceptance of security, vacate the said New North Church (usually called West St Giles' Church), which shall thereupon be incorporated with and form part of the High Kirk.' Now, the £10,500 was obtained, a new church has been built, and it constitutes the church of the New North or West St Giles' parish. The result of this is stated in the conclusion of the section, which declares, in unambiguous language, that the area of the former West St Giles' Church shall be 'incorporated with and form part of the High Kirk.'

"Now, the pursuers are entitled to draw the whole of the rents of the pews

of the High Kirk, and are entitled, in consequence of this, to draw the rents of pews on the area of the former West St Giles' Church, which is now a part of the High Kirk, unless there be some specialty which prevents this legal consequence. The defenders find such a specialty to exist in the 2d section of this Act, which directs the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to apply £10,000 in the purchase of a site, and in the erection thereon of a church 'in lieu of the New North Church (usually called West St Giles' Church), and shall invest the sum of £500 on such separate security as they shall consider proper, the interest whereof shall be accumulated and applied pro tanto in the maintenance of the fabric of that part of the building presently occupied by the said New North Church (usually called West St Giles'), but declaring that nothing herein contained shall limit the obligation of the said Edinburgh Ecclesiastical Commissioners to maintain the fabric of the whole building as provided by the said recited Acts.' The argument by the defenders upon this section is—(1) That a new church has been erected in lieu of the old church, and the pursuers draw the rents of the pews in that new church, and consequently they cannot draw rents for pews in the area of the old church. It is quite true that the pursuers do draw the rents of the pews in the new church, but still that does not derogate from their right to draw the rents of all the pews of all the parish churches in Edinburgh, of which the High Kirk of Edinburgh is one, enlarged, no doubt, by incorporation with the area of the former West St Giles' Church. In the second place, it is said that the rents of the pews from that area cannot be demanded by the pursuers, because they have obtained a specific fund for keeping up the fabric of the old West St Giles' Church, and do not need the pew rents to assist them in that particular. It is quite true that the pursuers did get a sum allocated to them under the Act, viz., £500, the interest whereof they were to apply 'in the maintenance of the fabric of that part of the building,' but the interest of this £500 was only to be 'pro tanto,' and any deficiency arising therefrom they were obliged to make up from their 'general purpose' fund, in terms of the obligations laid upon them by the Act 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 50. There is nothing in the fact that they did obtain this aid in keeping up the walls of the old church that will deprive them of the right to exact pew rents from sitters in a portion of the area of what is now the High Kirk.

"The original dispute arose about a matter which has disappeared in the course of the discussion, viz., whether the sums paid for the use of the chairs placed in the area of the old West St Giles' Church were to be considered pew rents claimable under the 6th section of the Act 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 50, or whether they were donations or gifts with which the kirk-session could deal as they pleased. It was admitted by the counsel for the defenders that he could not maintain the latter proposition, and therefore nothing more need be said upon the subject.

"The summons has a conclusion to the effect that the defenders shall be decerned to produce a full and particular account of the 'whole seat rents levied and received by them, and of their intromissions therewith from the date at which the said West St Giles' Church was incorporated with the said High Kirk, and became part thereof, whereby the true amount due by the said defenders to the said pursuers may appear and be ascertained by our said Lords, and to exhibit and produce annually hereafter to the said pursuers a full and particular account of the whole seat rents levied and received by them, and of their intromissions with the same.'

"Then follows a conclusion for payment of £1000, or such sum as should be ascertained to be the amount of rents received by the defenders since the date of the incorporation, with interest at five per cent, under deduction of a sum to meet the cost incurred by the defenders in providing the chairs and arranging and fitting them up. Now this statutory provision in regard to keeping and furnishing an account is contained in sec. 6 of 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 58. 'The kirk-session shall keep an account of the whole moneys received by them for

Without a legal process, the area of the Old or the West St Giles' Church could not be legally made part of the High Kirk. They had paid over the pew rents, i.e., rents for the building so far as seated with pews. But there was no obligation to pay over the donations given for the use of chairs which stood during the defenders' pleasure in an area which the pursuers had not seated, or expressed any intention of seating. The contention of the pursuers must be that they could reseat the area of what was once West St Giles' and draw the rents. If so, the same argument would furnish them with ground for restoring the old arrangement and introducing not only pews but a gallery into the building. It was clear that the Legislature had contemplated with regard to the Old Kirk that seat rents should cease to be paid to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for it had contemplated that that church, though ceasing to be one of the churches of Edinburgh, might be re-endowed as a quoad sacra church. If that had been done the seat rents would have belonged to the committee of management of that church for their purposes. The case with regard to West St Giles' was stronger, for in that case the Commissioners had provided for them another church, and had a sum of £500 invested for the upkeep of the old fabric. The chairs in that part of the building might have been provided temporarily by anyone. A member of the public would have the right to bring his own chair and use it. The duties of the minister were increased by the changed condition of the building, but the liabilities of the Commissioners were not, and they ought not to derive a benefit from it.

Argued for the pursuers;—The real question was whether the former Old Kirk and West St Giles' were not truly parts of the same building with the High Kirk for all purposes. In structure and use they were, so also in law. They were by the statute "incorporated" with it. The churches of Edinburgh were by law not "a congeries of separate parish churches," but their funds derived from the seat rents were to be dealt with as one common fund for defraying the expenses necessary for the conduct of divine worship in them all.[1] At common law a kirk-session had no power to let seats in a church, and there was nothing in the case of St Giles' to distinguish it from any other parish church. A parish church might be enlarged without a legal process if the heritors agreed to do so, and satisfied the Presbytery that it was efficiently done. So in the case of St Giles', space had been taken into the area of the High Kirk by arrangement followed by an Act of Parliament. The £500 invested under the Act of 1879 was merely a guarantee fund to be applied pro tanto in discharging the expense which the seat rents of West St Giles' would have been obliged to defray.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises questions of considerable interest. I cannot, however, say that I have found difficulty in resolving them, and that in the way which the Lord Ordinary has done. It appears to me that the ground of his Lordship's judgment, as well as the narrative which he has given, is pew or seat rents, and of the sums retained for payment of expenses' [the words in italics are now repealed by 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 87, sec. 32], 'and shall lay the same before the Commissioners yearly, or as often as the Commissioners shall direct.' This is a very plain and peremptory enactment, and entitles the pursuers to have at least a yearly account from the defenders. How far back the account shall be made to run is another question. . . ."

set out clearly and satisfactorily. The real question is whether the area, which at one time in the history of the building was the West St Giles' Church, is or is not now incorporated with the High Kirk. Now, I do not understand the statute at all if it is not intended so to deal with this area in the clearest way. Before the Reformation the area of the High Kirk was undivided, but after the Reformation there were several congregations worshipping in it, and divisions were set up in the fabric. A movement was set on foot a short time ago to have these divisions cleared away, and the whole fabric occupied, as was originally intended, as one place of worship. By the munificence of private donors that has now been completed.

Now, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are a body appointed for the purpose of providing machinery for the payment of the stipends of the ministers of Edinburgh since the abolition of the annuity-tax in 1860. As from time to time there have been modifications of their statute, there have been modifications of their duties. One of their duties, however, is to require from kirk-sessions an account of the amount collected from pew rents paid by the congregations accommodated in the churches, and these go into a general fund administered by the Commissioners, applied in part for the maintenance of the ministers of the town. They have a right to require this account, and to have the amount when ascertained paid over to them. Now, the clearing away of these divisions in the High Kirk necessarily threw into one space in the fabric the areas of the Old Church and West St Giles.' In that part of the space thus added to the High Kirk, as it formerly existed, which was occupied by West St Giles', the kirk-session have placed chairs for the use of those coming to worship there, and have received sums from those who occupied them. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners regard the sums paid by those occupying these chairs as nothing else than seat rents or pew rents, and they have called upon the kirk-session to account for the sums so received. I am of opinion that there exists no reason why they should not do so. For most certainly if the area is incorporated with the High Kirk, as I think it is, I think these sums are just the seat rents of one of the city churches within the meaning of the Act constituting the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. I quite understand the view of the kirk-session; they think the space is added to the space within their jurisdiction; and so indeed it is, in so far as they had jurisdiction within their former area but no further. They maintain that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have no concern with it, because a new church has been erected for the congregation which formerly worshipped there, and that the revenue derived from the space that congregation occupied may be rightly applied towards defraying the expense occasioned by the more attractive services in St Giles'. The object is no doubt a good one, but the question we have to decide is a pure question of construction of the Act of Parliament and the powers and duties of the body acting under it. These are defined by the statute in a manner as to which I have no difficulty in agreeing with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Young.—This case arises out of a dispute between two public bodies as to their rights and duties. It is a purely legal one, and depends on the construction of Acts—and chiefly one Act—of Parliament. It was fitting to have it determined in Court, but I think, on the whole, it would have been better to have had it presented in the form of a special case. The question is whether two parts or portions of what one would say on looking at it was one building differ with respect to seat rents or anything else from the rest of the church,—whether, indeed, in a legal view, it is possible to divide the church into parts and deal separately with these parts.

One of these public bodies of which I have spoken is the Ecclesiastical Commissioners created by the Act of 1860. The other is a constitutional Court of the church—the kirk-session. But it is not in that capacity that it appears here, except in so far as a special duty is placed on it by the Act which called the Ecclesiastical Commissioners into existence. I need not say that in the ordinary case a kirk-session has no concern with pews or seat rents, or indeed with the administration of parish churches in any way. It is a Court of the church having ecclesiastical duties within the church, but having no concern with the fabric. The kirk-session of the parochial churches of Edinburgh are in this respect quite exceptional. Duties are imposed upon them as to seat rents. By law I need hardly say there are no seat rents in the ordinary parish churches of the establishment. The areas of the churches—the churches having been built by the heritors—are apportioned among the various heritors who contribute to the cost of erecting and maintaining them. They make bargains about their seats, and at anyrate they may give to others gratuitously, or upon such terms as they think fit, the right of using the seats allocated to themselves. The parochial churches of Edinburgh stand on a different footing. They used formerly, as we remember, to be chiefly endowed by means of the annuity-tax, which has ceased to exist. So long as it existed, it led to controversy and disturbance, and it was a great object to substitute some other endowment for it. Even at that time there were seat rents. The churches were in the administration of the magistrates and council, and they levied rents. Part of the funds in the hands of the magistrates consisted of these seat rents, and they applied them in the course of their ordinary duty as magistrates. Indeed, in former times the magistrates applied a good deal of public city money upon the erection and maintenance of churches, and their expenditure, for example, on St George's and St Stephen's, contributed to the unsatisfactory state into which the city finances got. In 1860, when steps were taken to remedy the state of things which then existed, the churches were with respect to management and administration vested in the magistrates and council. They had not a right of property. They could not sell or alienate them; their duty was to hold and administer them as parish churches. It was for this reason,—that the custodiers could not sell or alienate it,—that the first Lord Curriehill used to refer to such churches as examples of allodial property.

Now, by the Annuity-Tax Abolition Act, 1860 (sec. 5) the whole rights of administration and custody with reference to these churches were from and after 11th November of that year transferred from the magistrates and council to and vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The magistrates and council were by being thus divested of the custody and administration of these churches severed from them altogether, except in one particular, the mention of which shews how complete the severance was, "provided that nothing contained in this Act shall prevent the magistrates and council from causing the bells of said churches to be rung on suitable public occasions."

Now, how are these churches endowed? Not by the annuity-tax as theretofore, but by special funds vested in these Ecclesiastical Commissioners for that purpose. Here, and here only, is there any necessity to refer to the subsequent Act of 1870, which made the abolition of the annuity-tax more complete and these special funds more ample. After that the parochial churches of Edinburgh were without distinction vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and every shilling provided for their endowment vested in their hands only. That is the condition of the church in Edinburgh now. One source of the revenue provided by the Act for the endowment of the clergy consisted of seat rents, and it is just therein that the parish churches of Edinburgh stand distinguished from other parish churches—I should say ordinary parish churches, for a somewhat similar state of things exists in Montrose. These seat rents of all the churches go into the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and are placed in a common fund, out of which they have to pay all the clergy. One church provides them with a larger revenue than another, one yields them £800 a-year, and another may yield a small sum. It happens that the High Church, which is in no respect different from any other Edinburgh parish church, yields a small sum compared with that £800, but it stands on the endowment on the same footing as the other parish churches, and its seat rents go to the common fund. This church has been referred to as a cathedral—a name repugnant to Presbytery. It so happens, as every one at all instructed in the subject knows, that before the Reformation the church was not a cathedral. Edinburgh was not a diocese. Indeed it was within the see of St Andrews. In 1633, indeed, when the Protestant Episcopal Church was established, St Giles' was declared to be a cathedral, and a bishop was appointed to a see of Edinburgh. But a few years brought that to an end, and I am not sure that the people of Scotland are generally proud of that episode in their country's history. But it was during that period, and by statute only, that St Giles' was made a cathedral, and after Episcopacy was disestablished there was again no bishop of Edinburgh, no see of Edinburgh, no cathedral. This church, therefore, is simply one of the parish churches of Edinburgh standing under the Act of Parliament in the administration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and endowed like the others out of the funds in their hands. What does it consist of? The High Church was at one time only the east part of the church. There were also under the same roof West St Giles', which was once popularly called Haddo's Hole, and the Old Church. That is, there were parish churches at each end, east and west, and also one in the south transept, the partition walls having been erected so that the congregations should not disturb each other. The same thing will be found in other towns, for example, in Aberdeen, Dundee, and Glasgow, where also the building was so large that it was thought not useful as a place of Presbyterian worship. The idea has now occurred, and I am neither surprised at it nor do I regret it, that it would be a grand and becoming thing to have the church restored to its original unity, and declared to be—the whole of it—the parish church of the High Kirk Parish of Edinburgh. That scheme required money, which was acquired chiefly from one beneficent citizen, and the funds being thus provided West St Giles' and the Old Church were all thrown into one, along with the former High Church,—that is to say, the old High Church was enlarged. It is surely as familiar an idea as can be expressed in language, the enlargement of a parish church. It may be done by adding to the old one, or a very familiar way of adding to a parish church is to pull down the old one and build a new and larger one, but still it is the parish church. In an ordinary parish the heritors have that duty. Here, however, the citizens, to whom the scheme commended itself, provided the funds. But then, it being necessary to provide a church for the West St Giles' congregation, which was to be displaced, a part of the scheme was to provide accommodation for that congregation elsewhere, otherwise their church could not be thrown into the High Church, or in other words, the High Church could not be enlarged by taking it in. The Act of 1879 was therefore procured providing that on the requisite sum being set apart to acquire a new site and build a new church "the congregation shall within twelve months from the date of such payment vacate West St Giles' Church, which shall thereupon be incorporated with and form part of the High Church." With respect to the Old Church, there was then no congregation belonging to it, and the statute referred to it in the preamble in these words,—"And whereas part of the building forming the southern transept, and formerly known as the Old Kirk, has now been added to and incorporated with the High Kirk, the dividing walls between them having been removed." The question is now whether these parts of the building are parts of the High Kirk. The Act of 1879 in its enacting clause, and its preamble, declares that they are parts of the High Kirk. To decide anything else would be extravagant. The church is one and undivided, the partitions being taken down just that it might be no longer divided. The immediate question relates to seat rents in the parts formerly occupied by West St Giles.' The former Old Church has, from the sources I mentioned before, been seated in the usual way. The former West St Giles' has not been seated with pews. It is seated in this way (and it is curious to observe the different language used by the parties). The pursuers say (cond. 8) that "it has been furnished by the defenders or under their directions with chairs or seats. . . . These seats have been let in the same way and at the same rates as the other seats in the High Kirk," while the defenders describe the sums thus received as "donations for the use of chairs." I do not much care whether these sums are so described, or described as seat rents. I think one might as well speak of donations for the use of pews, for pews are just seats, and if a man were asked to refer to a specimen seat he would probably say a chair. I do not doubt that if those having the custody and administration of the church,—that is the Ecclesiastical Commissioners,—were so minded they might, if no objection were offered by the congregation, seat the church with chairs throughout. But that is not material, nor is it material how the money is provided to seat the church. This parish church is in fact seated, and there is a congregation worshipping in it under the minister endowed by public law,—a charge upon the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Now, what does the statute provide with respect to their duties? Seat rents, we see, are an important part of the endowment fund. Section 6 of the Act of 1860 provided that "the pews or seats in the said several churches shall from and after the 11th November 1860 be let by or at the sight of the kirk-session of each church, with the exception of not less than one-tenth of their number, which shall be reserved as free sittings." The letting of the seats is to be subject to any direction of the Commissioners from time to time. It was to that I referred when I said that there were duties placed upon kirk-sessions of the Edinburgh parochial churches which were not placed upon kirk-sessions of ordinary parish churches. I do not think that any rights are conferred upon them, only duties—statutory duties. They are to levy and collect pew or seat rents as the Commissioners direct, it being reserved to the Commissioners, if they see fit, to levy and collect them themselves. And the kirk-session are bound to keep an account of the seat rents they collect and render it to the Commissioners, and pay over the proceeds to them, to be applied as the statute directs. Now, can we distinguish in this matter between that part of the church which was formerly occupied by the Old Church and the old High Church itself? I think we cannot, and, indeed, the counsel for the defenders put themselves into a somewhat absurd dilemma when they said that area was not part of the High Church. If it were so, the defenders would have no right there, for they are the kirk-session of the High Church; and if that is not part of it, they are not the kirk-session of it, and it has no kirk-session or minister. My opinion, therefore, is, that that area is part of the High Church, and therefore within the provisions of the Act imposing upon the kirk-session of the High Church the duties I have mentioned. And so also with West St Giles'. I am totally unable to distinguish between one part of this church and another, and I think it would be absurd to say that only that part which, before the recent enlargement, was the High Church had a minister and kirk-session. It has, all without distinction, a minister and kirk-session, and is, all without distinction, subject to the Act of Parliament.

The Commissioners have no interest in this matter personally. If the High Church yield a large revenue, the endowment in their hands will be larger; if a small revenue, that endowment will be so much less. They have thought it their duty to raise this action, and it was their duty to exercise their judgment in the matter. I cannot assent to the notion that what is paid for these chairs is just a donation for the rest and luxury of a seat. I think these persons pay seat rents.

It is said that the Commissioners got a sum of £500 invested in 1879 for the upkeep of the new West St Giles' Church. No doubt they got it according to the Act of Parliament, and invested it and are applying it exactly as the statute directed.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am satisfied that for the purposes of this action the whole area within the walls of St Giles' must be held to be the High Kirk.

It is true that the southern transept, which was formerly known as the Old Kirk, was thrown into the High Kirk by private arrangement, without any judicial or other legal sanction. But the Act of 1879 in its recital recognises the Old Kirk as having been now added to and incorporated with the High Kirk. Whether the incorporation is legally complete I do not stop to inquire. The incorporation exists de facto, and has been accepted by the defenders. Therefore, as matters now stand, and in the question with which we are concerned in this action, the area so added must, in my opinion, be regarded as a part of the High Kirk. This point is, however, of little importance, because the defenders have all along been willing to account for the seat rents drawn from the pews placed in the southern transept or the former Old Kirk.

In regard to the area which was formerly the New North or West St Giles' Church, there can, I think, be no doubt. The Act declares that on the occurrence of certain events, which in fact have occurred, the foresaid area shall thereupon "be incorporated with and form part of the High Kirk." The defenders urged that this statutory declaration meant nothing more than that the New North Church should be incorporated with the High Kirk in the same sense and to the same effect as the Old Kirk. I cannot so hold. The statute is express. There may have been some omission in obtaining proper legal sanction for the incorporation of the Old Kirk with the High Kirk. But that circumstance cannot, in my opinion, deprive the statute of its power, nor can it entitle us to construe it contrary to the plain meaning of its words.

Being thus of opinion that for the purposes of this question the whole area of St Giles' must be held to be the High Kirk, I also think that the defenders are bound to account for the pew or seat rents which are drawn by them.

But the true question which has arisen between the parties relates to the rents drawn from chairs placed in the nave or in that part of St Giles' which was formerly the New North Church.

When the restoration of St Giles' was completed through the liberality of the late Dr Chambers, the church was seated in this manner: Pews were placed in that part of the area which had formerly been the High Kirk and the Old Kirk. But no pews or seats of any kind were placed in the nave. We were told that on the occasion of the opening of the restored church the kirk-session put chairs in the nave for the accommodation of the public, and that these chairs have been allowed to remain ever since. They are the property of the kirk-session, who have thought proper to draw a rent for the use of them. The question is whether they are bound to account for that rent to the pursuers.

In my opinion, St Giles' is seated only in those parts which I have mentioned, viz., the former High Kirk and the Old Kirk. It was left in that condition after the restoration. No proposal or attempt has been made to alter it. The nave is unseated. It is certainly unseated in the ordinary sense in which that word is used in regard to an Established Church in Scotland.

The Act of 23 and 24 Vict. c. 50, which created the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, provides, by the 6th section, "that the pews or seats in the said several churches" shall be let by the several kirk-sessions, and that the rents thence arising shall be accounted for to the pursuers. This is the title of the pursuers to draw the pew or seat rents, and it is under that title that they demand the rents which the defenders have received from the chairs. If the claim of the pursuers is well founded, they must shew that the chairs are pews or seats within the meaning of the clause which I have cited. I do not think that they can. It appears to me that these pews or seats referred to in the Act can only mean the pews or seats which are put into the church by the owners or administrators of the buildimg. It is true that St Giles' was seated at the expense of Dr Chambers. But in restoring the church, he was acting with the authority of the owners and administrators, and in seating it as it was actually seated, he was in my opinion performing their functions. Thus the pews and seats which were placed in the church, though at his expense, must in my judgment be held to be placed therein by the body responsible for the seating of the church, and, therefore, that in the nave there are no pews or seats within the meaning of the Act.

If any one of the public desired to attend divine service in St Giles' Church, I think that he might have brought his chair with him, and sat in the nave free of charge. The pursuers cannot charge for the use of the building. They are only entitled to draw the rents of the pews or seats which are provided by the body responsible for the proper seating of the church. Neither they nor any other person, so far as I can see, could exclude an intending worshipper from the church, or prevent him from making provision for his comfort during the service. But what each individual might do for himself has been done by the kirk-session. They have provided chairs, and they draw a money payment or rent, if the word be preferred, for the use of them. But as, in my opinion, these chairs are not pews or seats within the meaning of the Act, the defenders are not bound to account to the pursuers for these moneys.

We are not called on to decide whether the pursuers are entitled to seat the nave, or even to put chairs therein, in order that they may draw rents from them. That point cannot be decided in this case, nor can it be decided without calling other parties than the present defenders. For the purposes of this action I think that I am bound to take the church as it is, and while it remains in its present condition, the defenders are, in my opinion, bound to account for such rents as they receive for the pews and seats in the area of the former High Church and Old Church; but they are not in my judgment bound to account for the rents which they receive for chairs which they placed in the nave.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure.

Trust—Personal liability of trustee—Loan on heritable security—Security for capital and interest.—Circumstances in which a gratuitous trustee was found personally liable for trust-funds lent by him on the security of heritable subjects.

Observed that where trust-moneys are lent on the security of heritable subjects, if any part thereof is in the occupation of the owner the trustee ought to take that fact into consideration in estimating the amount of the rental available for payment of interest on the loan.

Observed that where the primary purpose of a trust is to secure an alimentary provision, the trustee is bound to be specially careful that the security is sufficient to ensure payment of the interest on the loan.

1st Division, with three consulted Judges.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

MRS DICKSON SOADY, Edrington, Berwickshire, died in 1863, leaving a last will and testament dated in that year, in which she nominated John Turnbull, W.S., Edinburgh, and others, trustees. Mr Turnbull and another, who died in 1865, accepted office as trustees. After the death of his co-trustee Mr Turnbull acted as sole trustee, and also as law-agent for the trust.

By her trust-deed Mrs Soady directed her trustees, after conversion of her estate, to invest the proceeds thereof and pay the interest to her daughter Mrs Camilla Maclean for life, for her sole and separate use and benefit, without power of anticipation, and at Mrs Maclean's death to divide the estate as directed.

The trust-funds under Mr Turnbull's charge consisted of £500, which he administered as trustee under an inter vivos trust-deed, and £2500, being the amount of Mrs Soady's estate after conversion was effected.

Prior to 1881 £2000 of Mrs Soady's trust-funds were lent on the security of the lands of Tandlaw, Berwickshire, and £500 over houses in Merchiston Avenue, Edinburgh. The £500 administered by Mr Turnbull under the inter vivos deed was also lent over Tandlaw.

In 1881 Tandlaw was sold by the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank, and was bought by Mr Turnbull, who, on 6th September of that year, paid up the bonds affecting the estate.

On 8th September 1881 the whole trust-funds, amounting to £3000, were lent by Mr Turnbull as trustee, upon a bond and disposition in security over the estate of Nenthorn, Roxburghshire, to Mr Frederick L. Roy, proprietor of the estate.

At the date of the loan the estate was burdened by fourteen prior bonds for loans amounting to £49,525, a bond of annuity to the widow of the late proprietor of £260 per annum, which was valued at £2700, and a bond of annuity for £300 to the wife of Mr F. L. Roy, in the event of her surviving her husband, which was valued at £5000.

On 9th March 1887 Mrs Maclean, with consent of her husband, raised an action in the Court of Session against Mr Turnbull, as trustee, concluding for declarator, "that the defender has incurred personal liability for the sum of £3000, belonging to the trust-estate of the said Mrs Dickson Soady, together with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from and after the term of Martinmas 1884 until payment; and that the defender, in his accounts with the said trust-estate, and with the pursuer Mrs Camilla Soady or Maclean as beneficiary under her mother's said testament, is bound, out of his own funds, to replace and make good the said sum of £3000, with interest thereon as aforesaid, to the said trust-estate, and thereafter to invest and to administer the said sum, with the accruing interest thereon, in terms of the said testament, and in accordance with his duty as trustee." The summons also contained a conclusion for payment and an alternative conclusion for damages.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 7) "The said loan of £3000 was made by the defender negligently and in breach of his duty as trustee foresaid, and also as law-agent for the said trust-estate. The loan was not such as any neutral law-agent, acting impartially and with due skill and consideration in the interest of the trust-estate, could in the ordinary course of business have advised as an investment for trust-funds. It was also such an investment as no prudent trustee, acting with ordinary care, should have accepted for trust-funds under his charge. The owner of Nenthorn, Mr Roy, prior to the said loan being made to him, was, and was known by the defender to be, embarrassed in his affairs and in pecuniary difficulties. There were sums heritably secured in fifteen separate securities over the estate of Nenthorn, all preferable to the said loan, and amounting in all to the sum of £57,225, and the said bond and disposition in security taken by the defender was a postponed bond, sixteenth in order of ranking after the various securities for the said £57,225. The defender had acted, and did act, as agent for the said Frederick Lewis Roy both before and after the date of the said loan, and being acquainted with the affairs of the said Frederick Lewis Roy, and the correspondent of his local agent, Mr Tait, W.S., Kelso, the said loan was made between terms, in September 1881, to meet the needs and convenience of the said Frederick Lewis Roy, and without due consideration and inquiry in the interest of the said trust-estate. The purpose to which the said sum of £3000 was to be applied—viz., the stocking of the farm of Whitehill, which had fallen into the proprietor's hands—was in itself indicative to a prudent trustee or agent that the loan was hazardous. No formal proposal for the loan, accompanied by a rental, was made to the defender. No valuation of Nenthorn by any neutral and skilled person was asked or obtained by the defender on behalf of the trust as the lender; nor was any attention paid by him to the facts that much of the estate was unlet or was going out of lease, that large reductions in rent had been found necessary and were plainly in prospect, and that on any reasonable calculation, made with ordinary care and prudence in the interest and for the protection of Mrs Soady's trust-funds, the investment under the said bond and disposition in security was sufficient neither for the principal nor interest, and should have been at once refused by the defender in the discharge of his duty as trustee and law-agent. The counter statements are denied, except in so far as coinciding herewith, and under the explanation that the National Bank took, in the form of a further postponed bond, the only security to be got for an existing debt."

The defender answered,—"Admitted that no formal proposal of loan was made to the defender, and that he did not get a special valuation of the estate made. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the defender had before him full and reliable information as to the value of the estate and the burdens thereon. He had also previously, acting for other clients, given loans over the estate to the amount of £9000, and he had then made careful inquiry as to the value and position of the estate. The free rental of the estate was estimated at £3137 or thereby when the loan in question was granted. The said estimate was moderate. Mr Roy had then only one farm, viz., Whitehill, in his own hands. The tenant of that farm had been ruined by the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, and the farm had in consequence to be taken off his hands. The rent which he had paid was £840, but Mr Roy only charged himself with a rent of £650, which was the amount taken in estimating the rental as above. Mr Roy actually paid to Mr Tait, his agent and factor, on account of the rents of said farm, the sum of £2185 between January 1882 and November 1884. In the said rental the value of the mansion-house and shootings (then in the proprietor's hands) was stated at £200. It was previously let for £300. An abatement of £107 for the year then current was also deducted from the rent of Blinkbonny farm. There were then no further abatements. The estate was exposed for sale in August 1881, about a month before the loan was given, at the upset price of £100,000, and in July 1882 at the upset price of £90,000, but no sale was effected. From £80,000 to £85,000 could, however, have been obtained at this time, but the proprietor would not sell at that price. The money borrowed over the estate when the loan in question was granted amounted to £49,525, in twelve separate loans by nine different lenders. There were also secured over the estate an annuity of £260 to the widow of a former proprietor (who is a lady of advanced years), and a contingent annuity of £300 to the present proprietor's wife in the event of her becoming a widow. The surplus rental was about £1032. The defender was not, and never has been, agent for Mr Roy. He was the Edinburgh correspondent of Mr Tait, W.S., Kelso, Mr Roy's factor, and as such his name was inserted in the advertisement of sale of the estate as a person from whom information might be obtained, but he never acted directly for Mr Roy or under his instructions in any way. Subsequently to the loan in question, a body of trustees, for whom the defender acts, after full consideration and inquiry, authorised a loan of £3000 over the estate, and after the latter loan had been granted the National Bank of Scotland advanced to Mr Roy £1250 upon the same security. At the time when the loan in question was granted Mr Roy had also considerable personal means."

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 8) "The income actually received from the estate of Nenthorn, as at the date of the said loan, may be stated at from £2000 to £2250. This sum was not sufficient to meet the interest or other charges upon the preferable securities, along with the public burdens and necessary charges for repairs, insurance, management, and the like. The estate of Nenthorn was exposed for sale by the proprietor in 1881 and beginning of 1882, but no purchaser could be obtained. Early in 1885 the proprietor, whose embarrassments had increased, granted a trust-deed in favour of Mr James Haldane, chartered accountant, who has since been managing the estate. The difficulties connected with the finance of the estate, arising from the depreciation of its rents and income, and from the large amount of the debts, secured and unsecured, in addition to the preferable securities above mentioned, have increased, and the investment improperly made by the defender of the said £3000 may be taken as having resulted in a total loss. The female pursuer has been paid no interest since Martinmas 1884. The counter statements are denied, except in so far as coinciding herewith, and the defender's arrangements with Mr Haldane as to paying interest on prior bonds are not known."

The defender answered;—"Admitted that in 1885 Mr Roy granted a trust-deed in favour of Mr Haldane. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that interest was punctually paid upon the pursuer's bond up to and including Martinmas 1884. The interest due at Whitsunday 1885 was not paid by Mr Haldane until Martinmas 1885, and since that date no interest has been paid on the pursuer's loan. The defender, in order to save the estate from being forced upon the market at the present unfavourable time, when it could only be realised at a great sacrifice, has himself paid the interest when due upon prior bonds, amounting to between £40,000 and £50,000, getting repayment from Mr Haldane as money came into his hands."

The pursuers further stated that they were willing that the defender should, on repayment of the principal sum sued for, retain the bond over Nenthorn for his own use.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The sum of £3000, belonging to the trust-estate of Mrs Dickson Soady, having been improperly lent out, owing to the negligence and breach of duty of the defender (1) as trustee, and (2) as law-agent for the trust, the defender is personally liable for the said sum, with the arrears of interest thereon from and after Martinmas 1884.

The defender pleaded;—2. The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defender should be assoilzied. 3. The defender not having been guilty of any neglect or breach of duty, either as trustee or law-agent, should be assoilzied, with expenses.

Proof was led in the cause, from which the following facts appeared:—Prior to the granting of the loan in question, Mr Turnbull, who acted as correspondent in Edinburgh for Mr Tait, W.S., Kelso, factor and agent for Mr Roy, had been concerned in the obtaining of loans over Nenthorn to the extent of £9000, which were charged by bond and disposition over the estate. In July and August 1881 the estate was exposed for sale, but no purchaser was found. In July, just before the estate was exposed, Mr Tait wrote to Mr Turnbull asking him, if the estate did not sell, to obtain a loan over it for £3000 from Lord Marjoribanks' trustees. The draft bond was made out in the name of those trustees, but, eventually, the loan was granted by Soady's trustees.

The estate, which was one of great amenity, had a total acreage of 1869 acres. There was on it a good mansion-house, with policies. The lands were chiefly let out in farms; there were also, however, woodlands and grass parks which were let for grazing. When it was determined in 1881 to expose the estate for sale, "Particulars of the estate" were drawn up by Mr Tait and were sent to Mr Turnbull to look over. He did not, however, act as agent for Mr Roy in any sense. Mr Turnbull had these "Particulars" when he granted the loan.* He did not get any independent valuation of the estate.

* Mr Turnbull, deponed,—"Besides the 'Particulars of sale,' I had the rentals in connection with former loans to guide me in making this loan. I was satisfied with the 'Particulars.' I have no doubt I examined them with a view to this loan. . . . I looked for a margin of income from the estate after providing for the prior bonds. I thought there was enough to pay interest on this bond, and still leave a margin. After providing for everything before this bond there was a margin of £1000. I have no doubt I made a calculation at the time bringing out that, but I have no record of the calculation. My information was derived from the 'Particulars.' I considered whether the estate, with all the previous burdens on it, was a good security for repayment of the principal. It would not be in accordance with my practice as a law-agent to lend £3000 without seeing that there was a margin to meet the interest. I don't know what margin I would require in the ordinary case; in this case there was £1000 a-year. (Q.) Is it a prudent loan, lending in such matters, to see that there is 30 per cent of income free? (A.) Yes, that is a very prudent rule. (Q.) Did you consider this a first-class security? (A.) No, it was not a 3½ per cent security when I got 4 per cent for it. I looked over the 'Particulars' at the time. The mansion-house is put in the 'Particulars' at the annual value of £200 a-year. I consider that was a fair value; it was under the value. If I mistake not, the rent when it was let was £250 furnished, and it is stated in the 'Particulars' as of the unfurnished value of £200. (Q.) If it was worth £200 unfurnished in 1877, was it not proper to value it at less in 1881? (A.) No. (Q.) I shew you a 'Note of the rental of the estate of Nenthorn, belonging to F. L. Roy, May 1881,' prepared by Mr Tait, in which the value of the mansion-house and garden unlet is stated at £150; have you seen that state before? (A.) I don't think so. I don't think I had information in May 1881 that the probable value of Nenthorn mansion-house and shootings did not exceed £150. I did not make any inquiry as to whether £200 was the proper sum or not. I had no means of knowing whether £574 was a proper rent for the farm of Burnbrae in 1881; I knew it was let for that. There had been no reduction in the value of farms since 1866. There may have been some reduction of rents before 1881, but the great depression did not occur until after that time. I believe it was the case, as stated in the 'Particulars,' that abatements of rent had been very general in the district. I have no reason to suppose that £574 was not a good estimate of the value of Burnbrae in 1881. I was not aware at that time that there had been a universal abatement of rents under leases dating back to 1866. I believe abatements were being given in 1881 in Berwickshire and Roxburghshire in such cases as required them. The lease of Burnbrae was, according to the 'Particulars,' to fall out in 1885. There was no term stated for the loan in question. In 1881 I had no reason to suppose that the rent of Burnbrae would either continue or diminish on the expiry of the then current lease. I don't suppose I applied my mind to the question; I could only have ascertained that by getting a valuation, which I did not get. I knew there was a Royal Commission sitting in 1879, inquiring into agricultural depression, and that witnesses were being examined. I am not aware that 1881 was a particularly bad year in a series of bad years. If Mr Haldane says that Burnbrae is now let for £400, I have no reason to doubt it. (Q.) Did you inquire or consider whether the farm of Girrick could be fairly valued, as stated in the 'Particulars,' at £710? (A.) I have no doubt it could. (Q.) Did you consider the matter? (A.) I happened to know that the tenant was quite able to pay it. I am shewn a memorandum with reference to that farm dated 1886. I believe that memorandum was prepared in my office, and was sent by me to the pursuers. It states that the tenant's proposal was that he should get an abatement of £300, and that Mr Haldane advises a reduction of £200,—that is, for one year—the crop of 1886—not a permanent abatement. The annual value of Whitehill is stated in the 'Particulars' to be £840. The farm was in the possession of Mr Roy. The value which I took into account was £650. I did not take the £840, because £650 is stated in the margin as the sum Mr Roy charged himself with. £840 was the rent paid by the previous tenant, who was ruined by the City of Glasgow Bank. I am not aware that the farm is now let by Mr Haldane at £450, but I may have heard it. (Shewn state-was produced, and is given below.* The "Particulars of the estate," ment prepared by witness in 1886)—It is stated there that in December 1885 the largest offer that had been received was £420. I don't know whether it is let for that or not. I assumed that £650 was the proper value of Blinkbonny for lending purposes. I am not aware that I made any inquiry as to whether or not any more than £550 had been paid under the lease of 1879. The only reduction I made from the entries in the 'Particulars' was £190 in the case of Whitehill, and I took into account of course also the reduction of £107 made in the 'Particulars' as to Blinkbonny. It is stated in the 'Particulars' that by arrangement between the proprietor and tenant the lease was to determine at Whitsunday 1882, and the rent to be reduced to £650. I never made any inquiry as to what the arrangement was; in fact there was no arrangement, the parties being at liberty to make an arrangement for the future as they thought proper. I am not aware that from 1879 there was only £550 paid for that farm. The grass parks are entered in the 'Particulars' as of the value of £468, being the average that had been got during a period of ten years. They were let annually. I don't suppose I made any inquiry as to whether that was an exaggerated estimate. I considered myself bound for the safety of the lender. I did not apply my mind as to whether £468 was a fair value or not. The rental obtained during the first five years of the period for which the average is taken is much larger than the rental for the second five years. If the average were taken of the second five years, it would be much lower than the average of the whole ten. There was not a progressive reduction from 1877; in 1880 the rent received was £466, which was considerably over what had been got before. I cannot speak to the rental of grass parks throughout the country prior to 1881. (Q.) Were you aware that from 1877 downwards, in consequence of the fall in the value of stocks, nobody could rely upon an average taken before 1877? (A.) No; I am not aware that the rent of grass parks was falling from 1877, but I know that rents generally were falling from 1881, and grass parks would fall also. I don't consider that in this matter I was bound to look only at the five years immediately preceding 1881. I think I was entitled to go back to the good years; good years were expected again. (Q.) Did you at the date when you lent this money apply your mind to consider whether an average of ten years—five good and five bad—was a safe average to go upon? (A.) Yes; I took it all into consideration. The result was that I considered there was a good margin upon the estate to keep the loan safe; that was the conclusion I came to. (Q.) So far as regards these grass parks, did you think ten years was a proper average to take for the purpose of judging of this security? (A.) Probably I did, because, although the second five years were lower than the first, every one expected rents and prices to go up again. I don't know whether the importation of frozen meat subsequent to 1876 had any bearing upon the question of such a valuation from a lender's point of view. Rents were going down, but what the cause was I did not know; probably the importation of frozen meat contributed to it. I cannot say to what particular figures I applied my mind as regards the grass parks; it is six or seven years ago. I assumed the statement of public burdens in the 'Particulars' to be correct. There is no entry of any charge for roads or bridges under the Roads and Bridges Act; the Act had not then come into force. The Act had been passed. I don't think the charges under that Act required to be in the contemplation of a lender, because proprietors were paying tolls and statute labour, which came in place of the assessments under the Roads and Bridges Act. I hold that the passing of that Act did not increase the burdens upon land against the proprietor. I hold that the assessment in the county of Berwick is no more now than was paid by the inhabitants of the county before the passing of the Act. If £60 has to be added to the public burdens in respect of the Roads and Bridges assessment, then there must be a corresponding increase on the rent for the saving to the tenants. I did not take into account the property-tax, or any taxes not stated in the 'Particulars.' I made an allowance from the rental for management, repairs, insurance, &c. I cannot state what the allowance was; I made no note of it. I should think I made a calculation as to what margin there would be after this loan was given, but I have no note of it. I assumed that the whole of the statements in the 'Particulars' were correct. In doing so I relied on the statements of Mr Tait. (Q.) I think you wrote that in giving the loan you did so only in consequence of your confidence in Mr Tait's management. (Shewn letter of 9th February 1885 to Mr Roy)—(Q.) Is it the case that the loan was made only in consequence of your confidence in Mr Tait's management? (A.) If I must tell it, I will. Mr Roy was a most troublesome individual to deal with, and a man with whom it was most difficult to get on, and unless the estate had been in the management of someone in whom I had confidence, and who I was sure would pay the interest without objection when the term came, I would have recommended my clients not to lend the money whatever the security was. By the Court.—My confidence in Mr Tait was only one of the elements that influenced me in granting the loan. Examination continued.—I did not make any special inquiry as to whether the statements in the 'Particulars' were true or not. I did not make any special criticism of them with a view to the protection of the lender. I did not know what the money lent was to be applied to. (Referred to letter by witness, dated 30th November 1886)—It would appear from that letter that it was to stock the farm of Whitehill, which had fallen into the proprietor's hands." The witness further stated that he had in his possession several rentals obtained by him for the purposes of previous loans negotiated by him.

He further deponed,—"In deciding as to whether there was an ample margin, I had recourse to all the knowledge which was then available as to the prospects of agriculture and of rents in that county. I have no doubt that I took all the knowledge that I had at the time into account in deciding upon the loan, and judging of the rental. In regard to the two farms of Whitehill and Blinkbonny, the rental on which I proceeded allowed a considerable deduction on the former rents. Whitehill had been rented at £840, and I took it in the

As has been already explained, Mr Craig was involved in the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, and had therefore to request the proprietor to relieve him of the obligations contained in the lease. In consequence of the recent bad seasons, abatements have very generally been given in the district, and the proprietor accordingly has charged himself with only £650 of rent, and has for the last two years returned that sum to the Valuation-roll.

landlord's hands at £650, an abatement of something like 20 or 25 per cent. In regard to Blinkbonny, the difference between the rental under the lease and the rental I estimated was £107, being a deduction of something like 15 per cent. As to the grass parks, it is not the case that there had been a progressive fall in the rental prior to 1881 ; the rents varied. The rents were low in 1881, but we expected them to go up again. The rental assumed in the 'Particulars' was within £2 of the rental actually got in 1880. The burdens on the property—the existing bonds—came to £49,500. I had the particulars of these bonds before me, and knew exactly the interest which was being paid on them. The interest on some of them was 3½, and on others 3¾ and 4 per cent. In considering as to the loan in question, I took the interest on the prior bonds at 4 per cent, which gave £1981. Adding to that the amount of the annuity to Mrs Roy senior, £260, the total annual burden on the estate was £2240. In

It further appeared from the "Particulars" that the farm of Burnbrae (290 acres) was let for nineteen years from May 1866 at a rent of £540, and the farm of Girrick (463 acres) for twenty-one years from May 1874, at a rent of £660. The acreage of Whitehill farm was 426 acres, and that of Blinkbonny 487. The grass parks were let to various persons, and the rent given in the "Particulars," viz., £468, was given on the average rent of the past ten years.

The public burdens were stated as in the "Particulars" at £147, 11s. 3d., those specified being minister's stipend, poor-rate, school-rate, registration-rate, heritors' assessment, county-rates, statute labour.

It appeared from the proof that had Mr Roy been willing to accept the price, £80,000, or possibly £85,000, might have been obtained for the estate late in 1880 or early in 1881, and that again in 1882 or 1883 there was a chance, which was not taken advantage of, of selling the estate for £80,000. Mr Turnbull, however, was not shewn to have been aware at the time the loan was granted that there had been any offer for the estate before that date.

Mr Molleson, C.A., Edinburgh, was examined for the pursuers, and extracts from his evidence are given below.*

that way there was upon the rental of 1881, as appearing upon the 'Particulars,' a margin of £900, and taking the actual rates of interest paid, the margin was £1032. I had no doubt as to the existence of that margin, and I had no reason to suppose that it was likely to diminish. Up to 1881 times had varied, some years being good and others bad; people did not at all expect that rents would fall as they have fallen since. I considered that the rental of 1881, making the deductions I did, might fairly be expected to be maintained."

* Mr Molleson deponed,—"On page 6 of the 'Particulars' prepared for the sale of the estate in 1881, I find that the free rental of the estate is brought out at £3327, 17s. 6d. I have examined the 'Particulars,' and in a question of arithmetic the rental, I have no doubt, is correctly stated. An examination of the 'Particulars,' however, satisfies me that that was not a reliable margin in regard to a question of the free revenue that might be considered derivable from the estate, either with a view to a loan or for any other purpose. I produce a statement which I have prepared, shewing wherein I consider the 'Particulars' defective. The rent of the mansion-house is, in my opinion, overstated to the extent of £50. It is stated at £200, which was the rent obtained in 1877, after which it was unlet, and I think £150 was enough to take it at in 1881, considering the fall that had taken place in rents since 1877, and also keeping in view the cost of upkeep of the house, gardens, &c. In making that and the other deductions, I have put myself as far as I could in the position of a man examining the 'Particulars' in 1881. With regard to the rent of Burnbrae, I suggest a reduction of £108, or 20 per cent on the rent stated in the 'Particulars,' in view that the lease had only five years to run, and that the farm would not let again at the same rent. There had been a great fall in rents owing to general causes, and I find that recognised even in the 'Particulars,' where it is stated that 'in consequence of recent bad seasons, abatements have very generally been made in the district.' It is consistent with my experience that deductions were made from estimated rentals in 1881, in considering the value of heritable property. I would not have taken an existing rental under a lease that had run for a considerable period as a basis for lending in 1881, without making a considerable deduction. With regard to the farm of Girrick, I would submit a deduction of 10 per cent upon the £660 stated in the 'Particulars,' in respect that the lease was a more modern one, being dated 1874. I think 1874 was long enough before the depression to require some abatement to be made. Whitehill farm is stated in the 'Particulars' as being in the possession of the proprietor at the estimated annual value of £840. I find it stated, however, that the proprietor had entered it at £650 in the Valuation-roll, and accordingly I would take off the difference and treat it as £650. As to the farm of Blinkbonny, the rental is stated in the 'Particulars' at £650, and under the lease it was £757, 10s. 6d. I find from the rent ledger that there was an agreement apparently running along with the lease, commencing at Martinmas 1879, under which a deduction was made for four half years of £103, 18s. 3d. half-yearly, reducing the rent payable for that period to £550. I would take off £100 from the rental stated. For the year after the last abatement there was a rent of £650 paid, but that apparently was an exceptional payment for a particular year, because afterwards it dropped down again to £550, and consequently I view the rental at that time as having been £550. The rent regularly paid under the lease was £550, with the exception of 1881, when it was £650, apparently under an arrangement with a view to a termination of the lease. As regards the grass parks, I find in the 'Particulars' that they are valued on an average of ten years. The rents received in the first five years of that period were in excess of the rents received in the second five years, and I think a much better way of reaching an average would have been to have taken a period sufficiently long, namely, five years, and I have taken the average of the second five years of the ten. I take off the grass parks £54, because the average of the second five years is only £414, as against £468 for the ten years. The public burdens are stated in the 'Particulars' at £147, 11s., being a trifle over 4 per cent on the rental. That is an exceedingly small percentage, and would be enough, in my opinion, to startle anyone. I observe from the books of the estate that total crown taxes paid from February 1880 to February 1881 were £228, 4s. 10d., and from February 1881 to February 1882 £225, 18s. 3d. I consider £147, 11s. is an understatement of the public burdens to the amount of £80. The omission is chiefly the property-tax and the assessed taxes. By the Court.—I think the property-tax is usually put under the head of public burdens; it is a tax you cannot escape. The tenant pays it under schedule A, and deducts it at the subsequent rent collection. Examination continued.—I find also in the 'Particulars' there is nothing allowed for the roads and bridges assessment, which, since Mr Haldane's management commenced, has required £50 or £60 a-year to pay. No doubt that was not chargeable in 1881, but the Act had been passed, and the charge was imminent and before everybody. I think something ought to have been allowed prospectively for that. I find in Mr Haldane's accounts repayments to the tenants in respect of payments by them of property-tax. The property and income-taxes for 1885 amounted to £90, 0s. 3d. The property-taxes were paid by the occupiers,—that is, the tenants—except in the case of Whitehill, which was in the proprietor's hands. By the Court.—I do not know that there is any specific arrangement as to tenants paying property-taxes, but as a matter of practice we constantly receive tax receipts from tenants, and treat them as equivalent to cash in settling with them. Examination continued.—In addition to these burdens I think a lender should have had in view the expenses of management, fire insurance, and repairs, in order to arrive at the actual margin. I estimate these items at £100. I think that is an extremely moderate estimate. The result is that I would reduce the free rental brought out in the 'Particulars' by £748, bringing it down to £2579. I think that is a fair and moderate estimate of the income as shewn by the 'Particulars' when properly criticised. That reduces the surplus to £69. With a margin like that there was no room for a loan of £3000; I should have felt very anxious, indeed, if I had held any of the more recent of the prior loans."

In cross-examination Mr Molleson deponed,—"I don't know the estate of Nenthorn; I have never been there. The criticisms I have made upon the 'Particulars' have been made without any knowledge of the estate. I cannot say whether £200 a-year is a moderate rent or not for the mansion-house of Nenthorn, with the fishing and shooting, but assuming that that was a proper rent in 1877, I think you would not have got so much in 1881. I think rents of places like that dropped considerably between those years. There would doubtless be different opinions as to whether the value of property was permanently down in 1881. I don't think it was the opinion of everybody that the depression was only temporary. I think the depression had got so thoroughly developed about 1879 or 1880, that there was a Royal Commission issued for the purpose of inquiring into it. I don't think I said that things were worse in 1874 than in 1866. I suggested a deduction of 20 per cent from the rent of Burnbrae, which was let in 1866, and of 10 per cent from the rent of Girrick, which was let in 1874. (Q.) So that in your view things in 1866 must have been 10 per cent better than in 1874? (A.) Yes. I think things had been going back prior to 1874; I think a rent got in 1866 would probably not have been got in 1874. I don't allow anything for the consideration that before the leases expired times might have mended, and the value of land risen again. I don't think that was a reasonable thing to take into consideration from a lender's point of view. For the year from Whitsunday 1881 to Whitsunday 1882 the rent paid for Blinkbonny was £650, and after that it dropped to £550, until it dropped off altogether. I don't know anything about the arrangement in connection with the lease of Blinkbonny, except what is stated in the 'Particulars' and in the ledger. I don't think a ten years' average gives so good an idea of the value of grass parks as a five years' average, because they have a year to year value, and you would not take a ten years' to find what the rent of a grass park might be expected to average. The rent in 1880 was £466. (Q.) Then why should not the year after have been as good? (A.) Because the average of the five preceding years militated against it. (Q.) If you are to average it, don't you get a more reliable average by taking ten years rather than five? (A.) Not in the case of grass parks. (Q.) What makes them different from any other subject? (A.) Because the average seems to indicate that grass parks were very much upon the wane, and that you are forced back to bring it up to a big average for rather a remote period in the history of grass parks, whereas, if you took the modern history of them as represented by five years, you would be getting a much more useful and reliable average for the purpose. I assume that the average of the preceding five years will be maintained."

Mr Molleson lodged further a statement of deductions which ought to have been made, in his opinion, from the rental in 1881. It was as follows:—

"1. Modification of rents—

not a safe or suitable investment for trust money: Finds that said investment was accepted by the defender as trustee without due inquiry having been made as to the sufficiency and suitability of the security as a security for the investment of trust money, and that the defender has incurred personal responsibility by reason of negligence, whereby loss has accrued to the trust-estate: Finds that the defender is bound to replace the said sum of £3000, he being always entitled to an assignation of the bond in order that he may effect his relief if possible: Therefore finds and declares and decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons other than the conclusion for damages."*

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuer Mrs Maclean, who sues with her husband's concurrence, has a beneficiary interest in the trust-estate, consisting of £3000, whereof the defender is sole trustee. As regards the sum of £2500, part of this fund, the defender derives his authority from the will of Mrs Maclean's mother, Mrs Soady. As regards the remaining £500, which is part of a sum provided to meet a marriage obligation, the defender has no formal title of administration, but he states that he agreed to act as trustee of this fund to oblige the pursuer, and he does not raise any distinction as to the degree of his responsibility for the two sums which make up the £3000. It is necessary to notice that the defender, who is a Writer to the Signet, has also, with the approval of Mr and Mrs Maclean, undertaken the duties usually performed by a law-agent in relation to the investment of the trust-funds. The case maintained against the defender is that the trust-fund has become irrecoverable by reason of its being lent out on insufficient security under circumstances which amount to negligent administration. It is therefore contended that the defender is under obligation to replace the unpaid capital and interest, subject to a right on his part to an assignment of the security in order that he may work out his own relief or indemnification in the event of the security becoming productive.

"It is always with the greatest reluctance that a Judge must approach a question involving the personal responsibility of a trustee who has been acting in good faith, and except for the purpose of clearly defining the conditions of the question it would be unnecessary to state that such is the character of the present case.

"In the argument before me no imputation was made regarding the professional skill of the defender, or his attention to the interests of his clients. All that is said against him is that he too easily accepted statements put before him regarding the value of the security on which the £3000 was lent, instead of instituting an independent inquiry, and exercising his own judgment on the facts as they would have appeared had proper inquiry been made.

"The money was lent in September 1881 on the security of the estate of Nenthorn, Berwickshire, the property of Mr F. L. Roy. According to the defender's evidence (p. 2, E), 'the prior bonds on the estate amounted to £49,525, and in addition there was a jointure to the widow of the late proprietor, and a contingent jointure to the present Mrs Roy, if she should become a widow. The jointure actually payable was valued at £2700, and the contingent jointure, supposing Mr Roy were to die at the moment, was taken at £5000.' (Mr Roy's life, it is added, was not considered a good life.)

"The sum of these incumbrances, together with the £3000 lent from the trust-estate in question, is £60,225, and the first question is as to the sufficiency of the security. The defender considers that the value of the estate, for the purposes of a security-holder, was £90,000 in September 1881.

"Mr Roy became in 1885 unable to meet his engagements, and granted a trust-deed. Since then it has not been found possible to effect a sale of the estate at a price which will cover the heritable debt affecting it. It is proper to notice that the loan in question is the fifteenth bond over Nenthorn, a circumstance which would naturally suggest to a man of business that the proprietor was gradually eating up his estate, and which ought at all events to have induced caution in making an advance from trust-funds.

"It is not easy to give a definition of what is a proper security for the investment of trust-funds. It may, however, be assumed that a security is not shewn to be a good security for trust-funds by proving that other persons were willing to lend on the same security. A prudent man of business, dealing with his own money, may be willing to lend it on doubtful security, either because he is offered a special rate of interest, or even without this inducement, because he is willing to incur some risk rather than leave his money uninvested. Indeed we know that persons of good commercial credit have no difficulty in obtaining money from the banks without security of any kind. But I understand it to be the law that a trustee may only lend the money of the trust on safe security; and the only meaning which I can attach to the rule is that the security must be such as offers reasonable assurance that the principal and interest will be recovered out of the estate in case the obligant should be unable to meet his engagements. It is in all cases desirable that the rental should exceed the annual incumbrance. I do not say that this is essential; because an estate may be entirely in the proprietor's hands, as is the case with many Highland properties, and may yet be a safe security for a first bond.

"I. In a case like the present, looking to the amount of the previous incumbrances and other circumstances, I conceive that the trustee was not justified in lending on 'annual value,' or the prospects of a good price being eventually obtained under a sale, but ought to have seen that the current return in the shape of rents was sufficient to meet the interest on heritable debt.

"On this point the facts are easily stated. The defender founds upon the rental given in a 'statement of particulars,' prepared in 1881 with a view to sale, in other words, an advertisement prepared for general circulation, and intended to call the attention of purchasers of land to the suitability of Nenthorn as a residential and rent-yielding property. According to this paper, I make out the nominal rental to be £3560, and I understand the net rental (according to the same paper) to be £3327. In such a paper it is not to be expected that anything would be said suggesting doubts as to the permanence of the rental. That is a matter which the purchaser is supposed to consider or to find out for himself. The defender, if he had applied his mind to the question, would have seen that under the conditions which existed in 1881 the nominal rental could not possibly be maintained, and that a statement of nominal rental was no true criterion for determining the sufficiency of the security. Mr Molleson, C.A., a witness for the pursuers (Proof, pp. 15 sqq.), gives reasons for reducing the nominal rental by the sum of £568. In these reasons I fully concur; and I must add that, as the farm of Whitehill was in the natural possession of the proprietor, I do not consider that the supposed rental of this farm ought to be reckoned at all in an estimate of rental as a security for payment of interest; and for this reason, that it would not be possible for the heritable creditor to make this rental available as a security by means of an action of maills and duties. This is a very material element in the case, because this farm, the profits of which went directly into the proprietor's pocket, is set down in the particulars, or at all events was treated by the defender as a security for interest to the extent of £840 per annum, when, according to the actual mode of management, it was not available as a security for interest at all. This was found out as soon as Mr Roy's affairs became embarrassed; but I think it ought to have been foreseen. On this point of the case I am clearly of opinion that the annual return from Nenthorn in the year 1881 was insufficient to sustain a new loan of £3000, or to provide for the punctual payment of the interest on such a loan.

"II. I have next to consider the question whether the capital value of the estate in 1881 was such as would constitute a safe security. As before observed, the defender estimates its value at £90,000 for sale at that date. It is satisfactorily proved that the price of from £80,000 to £85,000 might have been obtained for it had the proprietor been willing to sell. But, now, this possibility of the proprietor refusing his consent to a voluntary sale is one of the things which a with three consulted Judges, as it raised questions somewhat analogous to those raised in the case of Rae v. Meek (infra, p. 1033).

postponed bondholder has to consider before advancing his money. It is not said by anyone that Nenthorn, if put up to sale by a bondholder, would have brought £80,000, or anything like that sum. But it seems that Nenthorn is a very desirable residential estate, and it is in evidence that £80,000 might have been got for it by private bargain from a gentleman of fortune who was on the lookout for a residence, and also from a body of trustees who were directed by their trust to purchase lands in the south of Scotland. Therefore the position to be taken by the proprietor was vital to the security, so far as depending on the probability of a sale before the market for heritable property had become still further reduced, as was at least probable in 1881.

"Now, what is Mr Turnbull's opinion of Mr Roy as a gentleman whose co-operation in such a matter was to be depended on? I give it in his own words: —'Mr Roy was a most troublesome individual to deal with, and a man with whom it was most difficult to get on; and unless the estate had been in the management of someone in whom I had confidence, and who I was sure would pay the interest without objection when the term came, I would have recommended my clients not to lend the money, whatever the security was.'

"In point of fact, Mr Roy took up the position that he would not allow the estate to be sold under £100,000, or something near that figure—a very unreasonable position no doubt, but a position for which, I think, the defender would not be altogether unprepared, according to the opinion which he thus frankly expressed in his evidence.

"Apart from this specialty, I must say that amenity value is not the kind of value on which it is proper that trustees should lend, when the chance of obtaining repayment depends on the fancy of a purchaser. In the case of a first mortgage, I do not say that it may not legitimately enter as an element of the margin. The question whether a postponed security should be accepted as a trust investment is a question of circumstances, and here I think that the aggregate of all the circumstances—insufficiency of cash rental, speculative value, large prior incumbrances, and a proprietor difficult to deal with, and verging on embarrassment—ought to have stamped the transaction in the judgment of a professional man as one lying outside the limits of safe investment of trust moneys.

"III. There remains for consideration the question of negligence. If this were a kind of trust investment, prohibited by some positive rule of law, the mere infringement of the rule would create personal liability. But it is not so. The law of Scotland does not, as at present interpreted, prohibit trustees from lending on the security of a second bond. If a second bond may lawfully be taken, I see no reason why a fifteenth bond (which is the present case) may not also be accepted by trustees, always assuming that there is an ample margin. The question is then one of circumstances, in which the law requires a trustee to use his best judgment, assisted where necessary by professional advice; and I am not of opinion that a trustee is personally responsible for the consequence of a mere error of judgment. A man may be appointed a trustee who has neither professional skill nor average ability; and if such a trustee, after due inquiry, and making the best use of the limited faculties which nature has given him, makes an investment of the trust-money which turns out to be unsound, I see no sufficient reason why the loss should be thrown upon him.

"But, in the present case, my opinion is that the defender did not make due inquiry. He is a man of ability and of professional experience, but in this case, from some error or oversight, he just trusted to the statement of particulars of Nenthorn, and agreed to give the loan because that statement shewed an apparent surplus. This is the kind of negligence for which the law holds trustees responsible. I cannot look upon this as a case of misadventure arising from unforeseen causes, because I think that the defender had the means of procuring more reliable information regarding the worth of Nenthorn as a security, and that if

Argued for the reclaimer;—At the time that the loan was granted there was ample security for the capital, as was shewn by the fact that two offers for the estate were obtained, one prior and one subsequent to the loan, of £80,000 or over; and if land were again to become a marketable commodity very probably that sum would be obtained for the place hereafter. At the date of the loan there was a sufficient margin of rent to cover the interest. The great fall in the value of land had scarcely begun, or at least was not realised even by practical men, at that time.* The insufficiency came entirely from the depreciation of land, to a degree which no one could anticipate. Mr Molleson's evidence was valueless, as he was simply judging the position the defender took up in 1881 in the light of after events. In granting the loan the defender had ample information before him without obtaining a valuation. He not only had the particulars of the estate (from the estimates in which he made considerable deductions as appeared from his evidence), but he had rentals in his possession obtained by him for the purpose of inquiring into the affairs of the estate when he was negotiating former loans. The utmost that could be said against him was that he had made an error in judg-he had been fully informed he would not have lent the trust money on the security of that already heavily mortgaged estate.

"No question has been raised as to the computation of damages. The judgment will find the defender accountable for the £3000, he retaining the present security for his personal indemnification."

* See the evidence of Mr John Clay of Kerchester, a member of the Duke of Richmond's Commission on Agriculture in 1880:—"I remember being in London in the summer of 1881 in connection with the Commission, and meeting a gentleman who spoke to me about Nenthorn. He was a Scotch gentleman who had made money, and wished to buy property in Scotland. I spoke to him about Nenthorn and the amenity of it, the fishing water round about, and the locality, and he asked me as a favour if I would see the agents and ascertain if they would entertain an offer. He consulted me as to what price he should offer, and I said £80,000. At the same time I said I did not think it could be got for that, as they were asking £100,000 for it, and, considering its amenity and the fine property, I thought he might go the length of £85,000. He then requested me to see the agents and ask if they would entertain an offer at £85,000. I was to begin by seeing if they would take £80,000. I called upon Mr Tait, but he would not entertain my proposal; he considered the property was so much more valuable than my idea at the time. I said, if he would ask £85,000, I did not think there would be any difficulty in coming to a bargain. I have seen the particulars of the estate which were prepared for the exposure in 1881. Comparing these with my actual knowledge of the property, I am still of opinion that in 1881 the estate was worth at least £80,000. There was no confirmed reduction in the value of land at that time, but landlords were beginning then to recognise that a reduction of ten per cent was required for the bad year of 1877 and the bad year of 1879. The bad year of 1877 was the beginning of the mischief, and after that all the odd years ran bad and all the straight years ran fair, not good. On to the summer of 1881 there was a general hope and belief that the depression would be merely temporary, such as we had seen before; but the collapse came in the back end of 1881, running into 1882. The prospect was pretty fair up to August 1881, when harvest and a wet season came on. Times were very good in 1874, and they continued good till 1876. The highest rate of letting land ran into the spring of 1877, and the fall began after the wet summer and bad harvest and bad winter of that year. Farms were not let higher in 1866 than in 1874—the very reverse. Residential amenity often makes a difference of five or ten years' purchase in the price of an estate. I have known as much as forty-five years' purchase given for an estate which formed a pleasant residence—Otterside, on the borders of Northumberland. Cross.—It was about 1870 when that high price was got."

ment, and there was no suggestion that he would not have acted in precisely the same way had he been dealing with his own money. The point chiefly pressed by the Lord Ordinary was the fact that a part of the estate being occupied by Mr Roy himself, that part should not have been regarded as a rent-producing subject, or, at all events, as a fit security for a person in a fiduciary capacity to trust to in lending the trust-funds. But there was no authority for any such doctrine. The mansion-house was not let or yielding return, because the proprietor was occupying it, but the lender was entitled to regard it as a lettable subject, if affairs required it, and the rent at which the particulars stated it was the smallest ever got for it. As regarded the farms, in point of fact only one was in the hands of the proprietor, and it was being put to profitable use. A lender was entitled to look to the farm as a rent-producing subject, not perhaps to so great an extent as if it were let, but the defender took that into account and took off £150 in estimating the rental of Whitehill. If the view of the Lord Ordinary were right, no person in a fiduciary capacity could lend money on land or any property in the proprietor's hands, and consequently no person could borrow money from trustees to enable him to farm his own land. To find the defender liable it was necessary to bring his conduct up to negligence; mere error of judgment was not sufficient. This was not a case of a trustee going outside the proper sphere of investment,[1] and that being so, he must be judged according to the general rule that he ought to have used such prudence as he would have exercised in his own affairs. There was here no suggestion that he had done otherwise. It could hardly be said that here the capital was not amply secured as at the date of the loan, and if so, the safety of the income was also secured by the power of bringing the estate to sale.

Argued for the respondents;—The trust here was an alimentary one, and the trustee was therefore bound to look not only for safety of the capital, but for punctual payment of the interest. The fact that this bond was a fifteenth bond shewed that the proprietor was gradually eating up the estate. Further, the loan was entered into at a time of great depression. The depression had not indeed reached its worst, but it was so bad that reductions had to be given on most farms all over the country. Mr Turnbull in lending the money took no advice from any skilled person. He had no valuation specially made, but simply relied on the particulars of sale, which were drawn up to tempt purchasers to buy the estate. The fact that a large part of the estate (and a prospect of much more) was in the hands of the proprietor lessened the security. The landlord could not be expected to make as much out of the farms as a tenant would, and, further, the ordinary diligence could not be used against him. The margin to cover both capital and interest was very small.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case involving the liability of a trustee under a testamentary trust-deed—a gratuitous trustee—on the ground of improper investment of trust-funds.

The circumstances out of which the question arises may be very shortly stated. The defender Mr Turnbull is the only surviving trustee under the settlement of a Mrs Soady, dated in January 1863. Under that settlement the lady, who died the same year, provided that after the conversion of the estate into money the trustees should invest the sum and pay the interest or annual produce thereof to the female pursuer, Mrs Maclean, for her lifetime, and afterwards divide the principal in the manner pointed out in the testamentary trust-deed. Mr Turnbull is the only surviving trustee. There were other trustees, but Mr Turnbull has substantially taken the whole management of the trust affairs under the settlement in question. There was also an inter vivos trust-deed under which Mr Turnbull has administered a fund of £500.

Mr Turnbull, I need hardly say, is a man of well-known professional ability, and has attained a high position among his brethren, and he was perfectly qualified to discharge the duties of such a trust without any assistance. The charge against him is that he invested £2500 of the testamentary trust-funds and £500 of the inter vivos trust-funds in a way which has led to loss—indeed to the loss of the whole sum—and that he is therefore liable to make the money good to the trust-estate. The ground on which this challenge is made is not the ordinary one of want of sufficient skill or knowledge, but that, having the means of sufficient knowledge and undoubtedly possessing sufficient skill, he permitted himself to overlook the most manifest elements of safety in making the investment in question, and that if he had only exercised—I do not say the care of a prudent man in his own affairs—but if he had only exercised the most ordinary prudence, this catastrophe never would have happened.

It is with great regret that I find myself obliged to give effect to that view. One sees quite plainly how the matter drifted into the position in which it ultimately stood. It did so mainly from Mr Turnbull having had his attention directed almost exclusively to another object, and from his exuberant confidence in the knowledge which he himself had of the facts,—a confidence which, as it turned out, was very ill founded.

In the year 1881 Mr Turnbull was a correspondent of Mr Tait, W.S., of Kelso. Mr Tait was factor for Mr Roy of Nenthorn. There was a sum of £2500 invested in Mr Turnbull's name as trustee over a property in the county of Roxburgh, the proprietor of which property had got into difficulties through the City of Glasgow Bank failure. Mr Turnbull bought the estate with that bond upon it. I believe that was a perfectly good security. It so happened that the proprietor of the estate of Nenthorn had got into considerable difficulty about the same time. That estate was exposed for sale in the month of July or August 1881. The position in which Mr Roy and Mr Roy's estate stood financially was a matter that ought to have received the gravest attention on the part of Mr Turnbull. The estate was covered with bonds to the amount of some £50,000. Of these bonds there were fourteen, each of them postponed to the one immediately preceding it. As I have said the difficulties arising out of the restriction of income were so great that in the month of July or August 1881 Mr Roy wished to dispose of his estate to a purchaser. But unfortunately other things also supervened. The farms, or some of them, upon the estate were falling out of lease. One farm—Whitehill—valued at £840 a-year, was upon the hands of the proprietor. Another farm—Blinkbonny—was renounced by the tenant. And these things happened before the events took place in which the present pursuers have an interest.

In July 1881 Mr Tait wrote to Mr Turnbull to say that he wished a loan of over £3000 to be found for Mr Roy, and he suggested that he might apply to the trustees of the late Lord Marjoribanks. Mr Turnbull not thinking it right, and probably in that matter judging properly and wisely, that the bond for £2500 held by himself as trustee should remain as a burden on his own estate, paid it up, and with the £500 then uninvested this made a sum of £3000 in his own hands. Accordingly, although he had prepared a bond in favour of the Marjoribanks' trustees, the loan was not made by them, but it was made by Mr Turnbull as Soady's trustee to Mr Roy on the security of his estate of Nenthorn. Now, without going further into the details, I think I have said enough to shew that this was a matter that ought to have had the greatest amount of deliberation. This bond which was ultimately taken in favour of the trustee of Mrs Soady was the fifteenth bond over the estate of Nenthorn. The Lord Ordinary has said, and I agree with him within certain limits, that there is nothing in the law of Scotland contrary to trustees taking a postponed security over landed estate; but when it comes to the fifteenth bond, each bond being postponed to the one before it, that seems to me to be a matter requiring very great thought and inquiry, because an investment of this kind is not an investment for capital only or mainly, but an investment for income. Therefore the main thing to be ascertained, and that all the more when the trustee was acting for alimentary beneficiaries, was to see that the rental or income of the estate was sufficient and left a sufficient margin. On the other hand, times and prices were bad. Land had been going down, and rents were going down, and the whole landed interest was in a state if not of collapse at least of difficulty. In short, it was not quite a good time to take postponed securities. I should say, although that would not be a ground on which I would proceed in this case, that the fact that there were so many prior bonds—bonds prior to that which was taken in this case—was a material element to be taken into consideration by the trustee.

But what was the result of all these difficulties that ought to have been taken into account in this transaction? The estate was exposed without an offer being received for it. Times went on as bad as ever for four years, and indeed down to the present time; but from one source or another interest continued to be paid for four years upon the bonds and then the whole affair collapsed, and in the year 1885 Mr Roy had to put himself under trust. The estates were handed over to Mr Haldane, the accountant. I fancy that from that time to this no more interest has been paid. According to the statement of the pursuers therefore the whole of this trust money, for which responsibility is sought to be fixed on Mr Turnbull, is lost. It does, I think, appear that if a sale could have been effected at a lower sum than £100,000, which was the price asked for the estate, the capital might have been saved. But that was not done. From 1885 therefore until now the estate has remained unsold, and I fancy that as far as the beneficiaries are concerned the money in question is a total loss.

The narrative which I have given, and which I do not think is highly coloured, is a very depressing one. Mr Turnbull had acted as Mr Tait's correspondent in regard to this estate for many years. Mr Turnbull had lent £9000 of the £50,000 that burdened it himself. He knew all about it. But as I have said his attention was not so much directed to the question whether the income which would or ought to reach the beneficiaries under Mrs Soady's trust-deed was perfectly safe, so as even to leave a margin, as to the effect which the transaction would have upon the estate of Nenthorn. It is not a case for saying that a man should exercise the same prudence that he ought to exercise in his own affairs. Knowing Mr Turnbull as I do, I cannot doubt that if the case had been his own he would have acted exactly in the same way. But then he had a confidence in the elasticity of the subject which has turned out to be fallacious. The result was that he did not inquire into the chief matter which he ought to have inquired into, namely, how the rental of the estate stood. We have the information now. Mr Molleson, an accountant, has gone fully into the matter, and he reports that instead of there being a margin of income for this £3000 in question there is none at all. The income will not suffice to pay the whole of the interest on the bonds, and if that is the case it will not suffice to leave a margin, as every such security ought.

That is the whole of the detail as it has been shewn to us. I have failed to see any ground on which Mr Turnbull can escape from liability. I have found no ground, I am sorry to say, on which the claim made in this action can be resisted. In the circumstances, and under the pressure which I have already described, and probably with a too sanguine expectation that the financial condition of landed property would revive and improve, he allowed himself to make this investment, which has had the disastrous result to which I have referred. Mr Turnbull makes no disguise at all about it. He says in his own evidence,—"I made the loan in September 1881 because Mr Roy wanted it, in consequence of his having been unable to sell Nenthorn." Then he says about the loan from Marjoribanks' trustees, that he probably intended to get a loan from the Marjoribanks' trustees, but he cannot recollect that he ever communicated either with them or with the beneficiaries under this trust on the subject of this advance.

Now, I do not wish to detain your Lordships further. I have indicated very shortly the grounds on which I think we must come to the conclusion that the pursuers are entitled to the decree which they seek against Mr Turnbull, to replace the £3000 in question. The pursuers are willing to give an assignation of the security, and possibly, although not probably, it may in the end turn out to be of some value.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Justice-Clerk. I do not see my way to differ from the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived. There are some of the grounds upon which he seems to have gone with which I am not sure I entirely concur, but it is unnecessary to go into that matter.

It appears to me that in taking securities of this description trustees are bound to look very carefully to the security for the interest as well as to security for the capital. An argument was strongly pressed upon us by the Dean of Faculty founded upon the fact that the value of the estate was quite sufficient to cover this sum and the large sums that had already been lent on the security of the estate. But it seems to me that the existence of those other bonds itself shewed that the trustee was taking a wrong course in investing the money on the security of this estate. If trustees were only bound to have regard to the sufficiency of the security for the capital, the defence that the Dean urged upon us might in certain circumstances be a good defence. But here it was, as has been pointed out, essentially necessary to find security for the interest as well as the capital. The money to be invested formed the whole trust-estate; so that there was no fund available for the benefit of the beneficiaries except the interest on this sum of £3000. Now, looking to the rental of the estate, and to the fact that nearly one-half of the property was in the hands of the proprietor, I do not think that there was here sufficient security for the interest as well as the capital. The admitted rental was about £3100. Then there was an annuity and a contingent annuity as burdens on the estate, which reduced the £3100 very considerably. When in addition you look to the fact that two of the farms were in the hands of the proprietor, who was not a person skilled in farming, there was no reliable security that I can see for the payment of the interest to these beneficiaries in the event especially of the fall in the value of land continuing. Mr Turnbull evidently made a serious mistake, and he must be held responsible for it.

LORD SHAND.—The Lord Ordinary has said in his opinion that it is with great reluctance that he comes to deal with a case of this class in which a gratuitous trustee is sought to be held responsible for want of due care in making an investment. I may say for myself that if I could see any grounds for differing on the facts from the Lord Ordinary I should willingly have done so, but I have come to the conclusion that there are no sufficient reasons for disturbing his Lordship's judgment.

Mr Turnbull, it need hardly be said, acted with the utmost bona fides, but it seems to me to be the result of the evidence as a whole that he failed to exercise due care in making the investment complained of. He had himself carried out a number of different loan transactions on the estate of Nenthorn prior to the loan in question, and it may be that as most of these had been of sums of not very large amount, he had not realised that the aggregate burdens on the estate had become so large, and that in the special circumstances into which the estate had gradually come, it was highly imprudent that any further loans should be granted. But whatever it was that misled him, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that he shewed a want of that care in looking to the material points with reference to the security which any prudent man would have shewn in investing the money of another. The rule to be applied to the case is that the defender was bound to exhibit the reasonable amount of care in arriving at a judgment which a man of ordinary prudence would do in his own affairs. The rule is thus expressed by Lord Watson in the case of Learoyd (L. R., 12 App. Cases, at p. 733),—"As a general rule the law requires of a trustee no higher degree of diligence in the execution of his office than a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own private affairs. Yet he is not allowed the same discretion in investing the moneys of the trust as if he were a person sui juris dealing with his own estate. Business men of ordinary prudence may, and frequently do, select investments which are more or less of a speculative character, but it is the duty of a trustee to confine himself to the class of investments which are permitted by the trust and likewise to avoid all investments of that class which are attended with hazard. So, so long as he acts in the honest observance of these limitations, the general rule already stated will apply."

Mr Roy was confessedly in a position of embarrassment, and this was known to the defender. He had borrowed sum after sum on the security of his estate until it was burdened with upwards of £50,000. There was one annuity then current, the capital value of which was £2700. There was a contingent annuity which might begin to run at any time, and the capital value of which was £5000. That brought up the debt or charges on the estate to nearly £60,000. No fewer than fourteen prior securities existed on the property, and though it may be true that such a number of prior bonds is not of itself conclusive against the propriety of granting a fifteenth loan, still it is such a peculiarity as should lead to a very deliberate and careful consideration of all the other circumstances affecting the security. The gradually increasing number of burdens shewed a proprietor running steadily into debt, and the holder of a security postponed to so many others was liable to considerable disadvantages if the earlier loans came to be called up and a new lender should not readily be found. Then it is not to be thrown out of view that the defender was aware that Mr Roy was a difficult man to deal with,—one who if a fair offer were got for the estate might be expected to throw difficulties in the way of its sale.

Again, if you take the annuities into account, as I think they ought to be, the rental, even upon Mr Turnbull's own view, was extremely narrow, and at the best did not shew a sufficient margin. Mr Turnbull took the rental without making certain deductions which a good many witnesses tell us ought to have been made at that time, looking to the agricultural depression, which although of course not nearly so bad as it has since become, was yet sufficiently serious to have led a man of ordinary prudence to make some deductions. But above all the material, and to my mind the determining, consideration is this, that with a rental of £3200 a-year the proprietor had already in his hands a farm of the estimated annual value of £650, and the mansion-house of the value of £250; while another farm of a rent also of £650, the lease of which was then current, was about to fall in, the tenant having renounced the lease as at the succeeding term. That was no doubt subject to a possible rearrangement of terms if the landlord and tenant agreed, but if there was no such arrangement that farm also would fall into the proprietor's hands. So that out of a gross rental of £3200 about £1300 or £1400 would be in the hands of Mr Roy, who had such large burdens already on his estate, and therefore large claims of interest to be met annually from the rental. That gave an element of serious risk to the transaction which should have deterred a man of ordinary prudence acting with reasonable care and not willing to run unusual risks from entering into the transaction. It was maintained that it might be no disadvantage to have even two farms in the hands of the proprietor, and that at least the stock and cropping might be made available by diligence if necessary on the part of the security-holder. To that argument, at all events in this case, I cannot accede in judging of the propriety of the security. Any such view is entirely weakened, if not destroyed, by the circumstance that the proprietor, Mr Roy, was a man of no means whatever, and having no income beyond what his estate afforded. As soon as the farm of Blinkbonny fell in, the return from the estate depended on the proprietor, then in impecunious circumstances, being able to make profit from about half of the estate in his own possession, while if Blinkbonny were again let there was every reason to believe it must be let at a reduced rent.

The circumstance most favourable to the defender is that apparently two opportunities occurred for a sale of the estate—one late in 1880, or early in 1881, when a price of £80,000, or possibly even of £85,000, might have been got; and another in 1882 or 1883, when the trustees of a Mr Grieve seem to have been willing to negotiate for a purchase at a price of about £80,000. The former of these opportunities for a sale occurred some time before the loan in question. It was not known to Mr Turnbull, and was therefore not a circumstance in his view in agreeing to make the loan, but his counsel very properly founded on what is proved as to the proposed negotiations on both occasions as shewing that the property had a value which would much more than cover the burdens, including the additional £3000 in question. The first observation to be made on this is that it leaves out of view what would happen if Mr Roy were to decline, as he was likely to do, and did, to sell at these prices. In that case there was a very serious risk that the return from the estate would not meet the interest on the securities, and the defender was, I think, bound to have carefully in view that the regular payment of interest was of vital consequence to his clients. But it was further a matter which a man of ordinary prudence exercising reasonable care should have taken into view that Mr Roy was a gentleman not likely to act on sound advice in the sale of the estate, but would in all likelihood insist on holding it for an extravagant price, acting on a speculative view very unfavourable to the security-holders at a time when property was falling in value.

It was strongly pressed upon the Court in the argument for the defender that the utmost that can be imputed to him here was that with full information before him he committed an error of judgment in taking the security, and that his bona fides and confidence in the security was such that he would himself have advanced the money had he desired to make an investment.

It may be true that the defender might have taken such an investment for himself, but assuming this to be so, I am humbly of opinion that in doing so he would not in the circumstances which I have stated have acted as a man of ordinary prudence seeking an investment free from unusual risk would do. As Lord Watson observed in the passage above quoted—"A trustee is not allowed the same discretion in investing the moneys of the trust as if he were a person sui juris dealing with his own estate. It is the duty of a trustee to confine himself to the class of investments which are permitted by the trust, and likewise to avoid all investments of that class which are attended with hazard."

If, again, I had been of opinion that with full information before him the defender merely committed an error of judgment, I should have held that he could not be responsible for the result, provided that it appeared that he had exercised reasonable care in forming a judgment. It appears to me, however, that, looking to the burdened condition of the estate, to the large part of it which was in the proprietor's hands, and to the probability of an additional farm falling in, it would have been a proper and reasonable precaution, which ought not to have been omitted, to have had a report from a man of skill after visiting the estate and examining the farms as to the probability of the rents being maintained. Had this course been followed I think the defender would have been advised in estimating the rental to make allowances or deductions of larger or smaller amounts such as were spoken to by several of the pursuer's witnesses, and his special attention would have been directed to the risk attending the falling in of the lease of Blinkbonny. He acted on his own views without taking any professional assistance, but in doing so I think his responsibility must be judged in the light of the advice which he would in all probability have received had he taken the proper step of consulting a man of skill who had visited and examined the property. There was, I think, a want of due consideration and care in the whole matter which, if given, would have resulted in the defender's resolution not to make the investment. I am, therefore, with regret, of opinion that he is legally responsible for the loss which has been sustained.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I also think that the defender is liable.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Inverness-shire. I.

ON 3d June 1882 the stock in trade of William Fraser, watchmaker and jeweller, 33 Bridge Street, Inverness, was sequestrated for rent on the petition of Donald Macdonald, his landlord.

On 3d August 1882 Fraser's estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts, on his own petition, and James H. Kerr was appointed trustee.

No sale took place under the landlord's petition, the trustee in the sequestration having satisfied the landlord's claims, with exception of a sum of £5, 7s. 8½d., receiving in exchange an assignation to the landlord's right of hypothec.

In February 1885 Peter Westren, a wholesale jeweller in Edinburgh, lodged a minute in the landlord's petition, in which he claimed a number of articles of jewellery, of which the trustee had taken possession, as his property, on the ground (which was not disputed as matter of fact) that he had sent them to Fraser on a contract of "sale or return,"—that is to say, on the footing that he was to buy at an agreed-on price such articles as he might be able to sell to customers, and that those remaining unsold might be returned to, or reclaimed by, the wholesale dealer.

Answers were lodged by Kerr, the trustee, and by Macdonald, the landlord, but the case of the latter need not be further referred to, as Westren agreed to pay him £5, 7s. 8½d., admittedly the whole sum due to him.

The case as between Westren and the trustee, although there were some specialties in the position of the trustee, was in the discussion before the Court taken to raise the question purely whether goods sent by a wholesale trader to a retail dealer on a contract of sale or return, if in possession of the retail dealer unsold at his bankruptcy, pass to the trustee for his creditors, or may be vindicated by the wholesale trader who sent them.

The Sheriff-substitute (Blair), after findings in fact, repelled the claim for Westren and sustained that for the trustee, subject always to the hypothec of the landlord.

Westren appealed, and argued;—The question here was whether goods in possession of a retail dealer on a contract of sale or return, and unsold, passed to the trustee for his creditors by virtue of the assignation in bankruptcy. They so passed only if the property in them was with the bankrupt, on the doctrine of tantum et tale, and goods with a retail dealer on sale or return remained the property of the sender until the retail dealer sold them to a customer.[1] Brown v. Marr and Barclay[2] was distinguishable. There the retail dealer pawned the goods which he had on sale or return, and it might well be that the wholesale dealer who had given the retailer possession of the goods should bear the loss arising from the improper use made of that possession.

Argued for the trustee;—Goods on sale or return, if not returned within a reasonable time, became the property of the recipient. That was the law of England.[3] [LORD YOUNG.—Is that not rather "sale on approbation"? "Sale or return" is more of the nature of agency.] Brown v. Marr and Barclay was to the contrary.

LORD YOUNG.—This case raises a question of some general importance. The question is, whether goods which are sent on a contract of sale or return to a retail dealer such as a jeweller, and are in his shop at the time of his bankruptcy, pass to his creditors, or remain the property of the wholesale merchant who sent them. I am of opinion that they remain the property of the wholesale merchant, and consequently that he is entitled to have them back, notwithstanding the bankruptcy of the retailer dealer.

The contract of sale or return is quite familiar in practice, and I think the Court is far from being unacquainted with it. It is of this character. The jeweller, or other retail dealer, has his shop supplied with goods on the footing that he may deal with them as his own by selling them, in which case he is held to be the purchaser, at a previously agreed-on price, from the wholesale merchant who supplied them, or he may, after keeping them for a longer or shorter period, decline to make them his own, or fail to sell them, in which case he is entitled to send them back as never having been bought by him, and the merchant is entitled to require them to be returned as never having been sold. It is a very special kind of contract, but one which is quite intelligible, looking to the considerations of trade convenience which have led to it. Retail jewellers, even in much larger towns than Inverness, cannot always afford to purchase the stock of expensive jewellery which their trade requires them to have in their shops on view and for sale, should they find customers willing to buy. In these circumstances they resort to wholesale dealers, who allow them to have the jewellery on the footing of sale or return, which is what I have just explained. It was on that footing that the goods were sent here. The property in the goods did not pass merely by the retail dealer receiving them, although the contract was such that the property might have been made to pass at any time, so long as the contract stood, by the retail dealer dealing with the goods as his own, and he would have dealt with them as his own had he sold them to a customer, for by that very contract of sale the property in the goods first passes to him and then to the purchaser from him. It is not very complicated. The contract does not pass the property; the delivery of the goods under the contract does not pass the property; but if the retail dealer sells the goods to a customer then by that very act the property passes first to the retail dealer and then to his customer. I have no idea, however, that if the retail dealer becomes bankrupt without having done anything to appropriate the goods his bankruptcy will pass the property first to himself and then to his creditors. I think that his bankruptcy does not pass the property, and that the goods unsold are not attachable by his creditors. The case of the landlord is governed by different considerations, for goods may be covered by the landlord's hypothec which do not belong in property to the tenant. But I give no opinion on the landlord's right to take goods in his tenant's possession on a contract of sale or return. That question is not before us.

We were referred to the case of Brown v. Marr and Barclay in 1880 (7 R. 427). I do not think that that case is in point. I have not read it fully, but I have looked at the import of the decision. If there are any observations in it contrary to the view of the law which I have expressed, I am of course obliged to say that I must be regarded as dissenting from these views. On the actual judgment there pronounced I am not prepared to say anything. Whether a retail dealer taking goods on sale or return, by dealing with them in some other way than by selling them may pass the property in them, which was the question in Brown v. Marr and Barclay, I am not prepared to determine. In that case the recipient pawned them, and I do not think he can be said to have got them on a contract of pawn or return; at the same time there is a good deal to be said for the view that if the wholesale dealer chooses to put the retail dealer into the position of being able to hand them over to a pawnbroker, the wholesale dealer must take the risk. But that is not the question here, and therefore, as I have said, the case is not in point.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute ought to be recalled, and the claim for Westren, the wholesale jeweller, sustained.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the result of Lord Young's opinion, and in the grounds of it. I desire to say, with reference to the case of Marr and Barclay, that that decision did not turn on any question of property, but on the necessary inferences arising from the possession of the goods. There the retail jeweller had possession, and he pawned the goods, and we held that as it was through the act of the wholesale merchant in putting him in possession of the goods and allowing him to deal with them as his own that he was enabled to deceive the pawnbroker, the wholesale merchant and not the pawnbroker ought to stand the risk of loss. That does not in the least conflict with anything Lord Young has said, in whose judgment I entirely agree.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact that the articles specified in inventory No. 5 of process were delivered by the claimant Peter Westren to the defender, William Fraser, on a contract of sale or return: Find in law that the right of property in the articles specified in the inventory No. 5 of process remains with the claimant Peter Westren: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Repel the claim of the claimant James H. Kerr: Sustain the claim of the claimant Peter Westren," &c.

Property—Superior and Vassal—Restriction on building—Self-contained house.—The proprietor of a piece of ground fronting a street in which the buildings were of various descriptions, feued it by one feu-contract to one person in four building lots, a separate feu-duty being attached to each. The feu-contract prohibited the feuar from erecting or maintaining on the four lots feued any other building than one villa on each lot, and provided that "each of the said villa dwelling-houses shall be detached from the others, and shall be self-contained and occupied by one tenant only." This provision was declared to be a real burden, to be inserted or referred to in any subsequent dispositions or conveyances. A villa for the occupation of a single tenant was thereafter erected on each lot. The villas and lots were subsequently disponed to different persons (the above provision being incorporated in the dispositions).

A petition to the Dean of Guild by one of the disponees for authority to alter his villa by erecting an outside stair for the upper floors and cutting off communication between them and the lower floor was opposed by another disponee. The superior was cited, but did not appear. Held, on appeal from the judgment of the Dean of Guild—(1) (following Buchanan v. Marr, June 7, 1883, 10 R. 936) that the proposed alteration being an alteration which would not preclude the villa being occupied by a single family, it did not involve a contravention of the feu-contract; and (2) per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young, that even if there were, the objector was not in titulo to object.

2D DIVISION.
Dean of Guild, Greenock.
I.

BY feu-contract, dated 19th March, and recorded 5th April 1880, Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, Baronet, of the first part, feued to Miller & Brown, joiners in Greenock, of the second part, four plots of ground in Finnart Street, Greenock. The feu-contract narrated that it was granted under "the burdens, conditions, provisions, declarations, restrictions, prohibitions, obligations, and others" therein set forth; and inter alia, "Third, The only houses, buildings, or erections which shall be competent to the second parties and the survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor, and their or his foresaids, to erect and maintain on each of the said several pieces of ground, shall be a villa dwelling-house and cellars and washing-house," which villa dwelling-houses were then specifically described. It further provided that "each of the said villa dwelling-houses shall be detached from the others, and shall be self-contained and occupied by one tenant only." Further, that "the second parties shall be bound within twelve months from the last date of the feu-contract to erect, and thereafter in all time coming to maintain on each of the several pieces of ground a villa dwelling-house of the foresaid description. Which conditions, provisions, declarations, restrictions, prohibitions, obligations, feu-duties, casualties, and others specified are created and declared to be real burdens on the said several pieces of ground and others, and real conditions of the feu-right thereto, and as such shall be duly observed, paid, and performed by the second parties, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor and their and his foresaids, and be inserted and duly referred to in statutory form in every future charter, disposition, conveyance, subfeu-right, and deed of investiture of the said several pieces of ground and others, or any part thereof, under the pain of nullity."

On each of the plots of ground, which were contiguous, self-contained villas were erected, and formed Nos. 74, 76, 78, and 80 Finnart Street. They were built in conformity with the feu-contract, and were each occupied by one tenant only.

* Decided July 18, 1888.

By disposition, dated 10th and recorded 16th May 1881, Miller & Brown disponed one of the feus, with the villa thereon, to Miss Annie Stewart Carmichael. The disposition duly referred to the conditions above quoted.

By disposition, dated 5th March and recorded 6th April 1888, Miller & Brown disponed to John Miller, one of their firm, the remaining plots and villas thereon, the conditions above quoted being likewise duly incorporated in the disposition.

On 14th May 1888 Miller presented a petition to the Dean of Guild of Greenock for authority to alter two of his villas by erecting outside stairs to the second floors, and cutting off the internal communication between the first and second floors in each villa.

Miss Carmichael lodged answers, in which she averred,—"The object of the alterations is to enable the petitioner to let each dwelling-house to two tenants or occupiers, the one tenant occupying the main flat and basement or sunk flat and the other tenant the first flat and attics. If the alterations proposed are carried out the villas, which are presently self-contained, and which have always been occupied when let by one tenant or occupier only, will cease to be self-contained villas occupied by one tenant or occupier only, and the number of tenants or occupiers will be doubled. The proposed alterations will otherwise greatly injure the objector's property as a self-contained villa by lowering the rental and otherwise, and the value of her property will be greatly lessened."

The petitioner answered;—"Denied, and explained that the houses in the immediate neighbourhood of those belonging to the petitioner were originally self-contained, but recently certain of these houses have been converted into flats. In particular, the houses Nos. 77 and 79 Finnart Street, immediately opposite the petitioner's property, were many years ago, and before the erection of the petitioner's houses, and the house No. 81 Brisbane Street, about 60 yards distant from the petitioner's houses, has recently, both contrary to the provisions of the feu-contracts of the ground on which they are respectively built, which are in similar terms to those of the petitioner's feu-contract, been so converted, while the house No. 85 Finnart Street, opposite to the petitioner's said properties, has been converted from a self-contained dwelling-house into a shop, dwelling-house, and dairy. Explained further that the houses in Finnart Street and the neighbouring locality are not built of any uniform design, but are of various designs and constructions, some being self-contained villas, others flatted houses occupied by two tenants, and others large tenements of dwelling-houses occupied by several tenants; and that the four villas in question do not form or complete any particular section or portion of Finnart Street."

The respondent stated in reply;—"Counter explanation denied, and statement irrelevant, as the conversion of two self-contained houses on the opposite side of the street into flatted houses in no way affects the rights of the parties under the feu-contract in question. Explained further that the property No. 85 Finnart Street is not opposite to the petitioner's properties but is to the west of same, and that the feu was given off a great many years ago, and is unrestricted."

The petitioner pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The respondent has no common interest, jus quæsitum tertio, or other right or title entitling her to object, and decree falls to be granted as craved. (4) The character of the locality having been changed, and immediately adjoining properties having been converted into flats, the respondent has no sufficient interest to object.

No. 174.

Carmichael.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The petitioner and objector being entitled to enforce the conditions and restrictions in the said feu-contract inter se, the petitioner is not entitled to make the alterations proposed without the consent of the objector, or otherwise the objector having a common interest, jus quæsitum tertio, or other right or title to object to the proposed alterations, and having objected to same, the petitioner is not entitled at his own hands to alter the buildings as proposed, and the warrant asked ought not to be granted. (3) The objector having acquired her feu in reliance on the provisions of the said feu-contract being observed as to the whole of the ground therein contained, and as the proposed alterations if made would injuriously affect the objector's property, she is entitled to object to the warrant asked being granted.

The parties by minute admitted the correctness of a plan of the ground and neighbourhood, from which it appeared that many of the houses in the immediate vicinity were tenements accommodating more than one family, and that no uniform style of building was observed, and further, that the superior had given no consent to the proposed alterations beyond what was implied by his accepting citation and not appearing to oppose the application. They renounced further probation.

The Dean of Guild, on 14th June 1888, refused the application.

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—The proposed alteration on his property was not in violation of any right of the defender's. It was an exercise of his right of property, which was not limited by the alleged servitude. It was not consistent with the nature of a right of property to be limited as the defender desired to limit it. The very point had been the subject of opinion in two cases, though the opinions in question were not altogether necessary to the decision in either.[1] The clause founded on by the defender was a limitation on use and not on structure. But (2) the defender had no interest to object. The plan shewed a flatted house just on the other side of the street, and sundry lots of unrestricted ground in the immediate vicinity. It shewed that there was no common plan, and also that the neighbourhood was already given up to shops and flats. To support the objection, however, interest was indispensable.[2] It lay on the defender to shew interest, but even if it lay on the petitioner to disprove it, that had been done. (3) Assuming consideration of the point to be necessary, the pursuer maintained that there was no such mutuality of obligation as would give the defender a jus quæsitum in the obligations as to structure contained in the contract with the superior. She could indeed point to certain elements which went so far to shew a jus quæsitum. There were similar—indeed identical—restrictions upon the four lots feued in the feu-contract, which was in fact four distinct feu-contracts in one deed. But that, even assuming that the objector had an interest, was insufficient.[2] There must be evidence in the deed that it was intended to create a jus quæsitum. But the restrictions in the feu-contract appeared to be intended for the superior's benefit, and his only; and further, there was no community. So small a piece of a street with no common plan did not present the element of community of obligation. There must be a common plan to be appealed to, or some similar circumstance to be found in the deed which would raise the inference that mutuality of obligation was intended.

Argued for defender;—(1) It was an error to say that the matter was one of use alone. The feu-contract, on a just construction of it, treated use as definitive of structure. The decisions referred to by the petitioner did not, assuming their soundness, carry the appellant nearly so far as he maintained. There was not in them the specific stipulation that the feuar was to erect and always maintain a house to be occupied by one tenant only, and suitable only for such occupation. It was not disguised on the other side that the intention was to get rid of this restriction. The competency of the Court enforcing such a restriction on use was well settled.[1] It was not repugnant to a right of property that a restriction on the use of it should exist and be strictly enforced.[2] (2) It lay on the other side to shew that there was no interest. Interest was to be presumed from the fact that the stipulation had been made. It was presumed that a superior had such an interest, and the same principle applied where it was alleged that a co-feuar had a jus quæsitum tertio.[3] (3) There was a strong case of mutuality of obligation, and therefore of title, to enforce the obligations inter se. Four lots had been given off to the same vassal, one of which he had given off to the respondent under the restrictions imposed on himself, retaining the others, to which the same restrictions applied. That was even a stronger case than if there had been a common feuing plan. The whole was under one title at first, and the defender was taken bound to conform to it. It was in favour of the other feuars, and not of the superior only. There was clear evidence of a common scheme. Four feus were not too small a number to establish a community.

At advising,—

Lord Young.—This is an application to the Dean of Guild of Greenock for authority to make certain alterations on a house in Finnart Street, Greenock, the alterations being of such a character as will enable the house, hitherto occupied as one, to be hereafter occupied as two. The application is opposed by a feuar in the same street and under the same superior, and the ground of her opposition is that there is a condition in the applicant's title from the superior that the house shall be self-contained and occupied by one tenant only.

It appears that the applicant got a feu from the superior of four building stances in Finnart Street, Greenock, adjoining each other, and a condition of the feu was that upon each stance there should be erected a self-contained house, to be occupied by one tenant only. After the houses were built he sold one of them to the respondent, his opponent in the Dean of Guild Court, and just as he held the building stance with that condition in the title, that the house should be self-contained and occupied by one tenant only, so he sold the house to the respondent with the same condition in her title. The alterations which he proposes to make are to be in one of the three other houses, which he kept in his own hands, and the questions to which the objection to the alterations give rise are, in the first place, whether the proposed alteration is in its own nature objectionable, and secondly, if it is, whether the respondent is entitled to object to it.

On the first point it is contended, on the authority of Buchanan v. Marr, that the proposed alteration is not objectionable in itself as relating to mere use. No structural alteration on the house is proposed—nothing which can interfere with the rights and interests of others—but only an access to the upper story to enable it to be used separately from the under story. In Buchanan v. Marr that was held not to be such a change or departure from the conditions of the feu-contract as to entitle even the superior to object to it. This case is very like Buchanan v. Marr—indeed so like that I am unable to distinguish it—and that being so, I do not think it would be right or becoming in us to go back on a judgment deliberately pronounced so recently. There is here use merely.

There is however another ground on which it is said that this objection cannot be sustained, and that is that this lady is not in right of it. She says she is, because she says that she was made one of a community of four feuars by the applicant, who got a feu of the whole four houses himself, and sold one of them to her. That is a very small community, and I do not think that the doctrine of community, as inferring a right in the feuars to enforce in their own interest a condition intended primarily in the interest of the superior, has ever been extended to a case of that kind. Where you have a street or a square laid out in accordance with a feuing plan, and there is a reference in all the feu-contracts to the plan, and to the same rules and conditions of building, then you have such a community. All the feuars are bound not only in a question with the superior, but between themselves, to follow that plan, and observe these rules and conditions. But here you have one of the largest and most important streets in Greenock, where there is almost every variety of building, and almost every variety of use, and in that street you have four houses, as to which the superior has said that they must be self-contained and let to one tenant only. The superior does not mean to enforce that obligation, he does not here seek to do so at all events, but the respondent comes forward and says she has a community of interest, which entitles her to object to the applicant converting his dwelling-house into two. I think that she has no title to object.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion, in the first place, on the authority of Buchanan v. Marr, that the objection is not tenable in itself, and secondly, I think, for the reasons I have last mentioned, that the respondent has no title to make it. I should therefore propose to your Lordships to recall the Dean of Guild's interlocutor, and to remit to him to proceed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am also of opinion that the Dean of Guild's interlocutor should be recalled. I proceed, and proceed entirely, on the case of Buchanan, from which I cannot distinguish the present. I do not give any opinion on the other ground.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have come to the same result as Lord Young.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

On 26th March 1888 a cab and horse belonging to Joseph Crookshanks, coach proprietor, Greenock, was seized by the custom-house officials, near Gourock.

On 15th April an appraisement of seizure was lodged before the Lord Ordinary in Exchequer Causes (Fraser), in which the cab and horse were appraised at £45.

On 1st May Crookshanks, as owner of the articles seized, lodged a claim for them before the Lord Ordinary.

On 21st May the following information was lodged in process by the Lord Advocate:—"I, the Right Honourable John Hay Athol Macdonald, Her Majesty's Advocate, on behalf of Her Majesty, inform the Court,—That Richard Lympaney, station officer, Coastguard Station, Gourock, and Edward Butcher and William Howie, both coastguardsmen, on or about the 26th day of March, in the year 1888, at or near Lavan Point, near Gourock, in the county of Renfrew, did seize and arrest to the use of Her Majesty, as forfeited, or liable to forfeiture, the four-wheeled cab and horse described in the appraisement of seizure No. 1 of process, and which are now claimed by Joseph Crookshanks, coach proprietor, Greenock, in respect—First Count.—That on or about the 26th day of March 1888, at or near Lavan Point, near Gourock, in the county of Renfrew, the said cab and horse were made use of by John Smith, cabman, Greenock, presently a prisoner awaiting trial in the prison of Edinburgh, or other person or persons to Her Majesty's Advocate unknown, in the importation, landing, removal, or conveyance of 343 pounds weight, or thereby, of manufactured tobacco, or other uncustomed, prohibited, or restricted goods, liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts, contrary to section 202 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Victoria, cap. 36), whereby the said cab and horse became forfeited or liable to forfeiture."* He therefore prayed the Court to adjudge the cab and horse to be forfeited, and to condemn the same accordingly.

Crookshanks lodged the following defences:—"Not known, and not admitted, that the horse and cab in question were made use of in the importation, landing, removal, or conveyance of manufactured tobacco, or other uncustomed, prohibited, or restricted goods liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts. Explained that upon said 26th March 1888 a horse and cab were ordered of the present claimant Joseph Crookshanks, who is a cab and carriage-hirer and funeral undertaker in a large way of business, in the ordinary course of his said business, by Walter Walker, coachman to John Macdougall, Esq., Rosemount, Greenock, and the horse and cab which form the subject of the present claim were in accordance with said order despatched on the night of the said 26th March 1888 from the claimant's premises in charge of John Smith, night coachman in the claimant's service. This was done in good faith, and in the usual course of business, and the destination and particular use to which said horse and cab were to be put were unknown to the claimant. It is further explained that the said John Smith had been in the claimant's employment for about seven years, and the claimant had every reason to believe, from the opinion he had formed of his honesty and trustworthiness, that the horse and cab intrusted to his charge would not be used except in the legitimate exercise of the claimant's said occupation. The said John Smith was, on 30th May 1888, tried before the Honourable Lord Fraser and a special jury, on an information at the instance of the Lord Advocate for Her Majesty's interest, on a charge of being knowingly concerned in carrying, removing, depositing, or concealing, or dealing with certain uncustomed goods, to wit, the said 343 pounds of tobacco, when the jury unanimously found for the defender."

The Lord Advocate pleaded;—(1) The defences being irrelevant, except in so far as denying that the said horse and cab were made use of as libelled, should be repelled except to that extent. (2) The defender's third plea being unsound in law should be repelled.

The defendant pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The information being irrelevant should be dismissed. (3) Separatim, The subjects seized having been made use of in the matter libelled, without the knowledge or responsibility of the claimant, he should be assoilzied from the declaratory conclusions of said information and the consequent penalty.

On 5th July the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:— "Repels the first and third pleas in law stated for the claimant Joseph Crookshanks: Allows to the Lord Advocate a proof of his averment that the cab and horse mentioned in the information were made use of in the importation, landing, removal, or conveyance of 343 pounds weight or thereby of manufactured tobacco, or other uncustomed, prohibited, or restricted goods liable to forfeiture, and to the claimant a conjunct probation." *

The defendant reclaimed, and argued;—The question came to be one of relevancy. To make the complaint relevant, it was necessary to add a statement that the cab and horse were in the owner's knowledge, or that of his servant, used for this illegal purpose. No doubt there was no provision to that effect in the statute, but the literal construction must lead to

* "OPINION.—The offence in this case was the using a cab for the conveyance of uncustomed goods. It is not necessary that the prosecutor should prove, in order that that cab shall be forfeited, that the owner of it knowingly lent his cab for the carriage of such goods. The fact that it was used for that purpose by his servant, or by the person to whom he hired it out, is all that requires to be proved. There are certain offences for which penalties are imposed by the customs laws, in which the scienter on the part of the offender must be proved, but this is not one of them. That a person may be convicted of an offence under the excise or custom laws committed by a servant against his master's knowledge,—nay, against his positive injunctions,—is settled in various cases, such as in Advocate-General v. Matheson in 1852 before a full bench of the Court of Exchequer, as reported in Douglas' Manual, p. 256, and in Advocate-General v. Grant (20th July 1853, 15 D. 980). I therefore repel the first and third pleas stated by the defender. And the only matter for investigation is, as to whether the cab belonging to the defender was used for the carriage of uncustomed goods. Of course the rule as to liability to forfeiture cannot be carried to an extreme. A conviction, for example, could not be obtained against an omnibus proprietor into whose omnibus a person carrying uncustomed goods had entered without the knowledge of the conductor that his passenger had on his person goods of that description. But that is not the present case, which is the employment of the cab for the sole purpose of carriage of the goods, and if that be proved it is enough."

great hardship, and so far as the record shewed would do so in this case. In the present case the owner was put in a dilemma. If he refused to take a passenger in the ordinary course of his business he was liable to a fine, and if he did take a passenger with luggage he had no power to search the luggage, and might quite unwittingly be liable to forfeiture of his cab when the luggage was searched by the customs officers, who had the power to do so. The Act, if literally read, thus placed a restriction on the exercise of a lawful trade. In the case of the Advocate-General v. Grant, cited by the Lord Ordinary, the Judges seemed to have thought that an averment of knowledge was requisite.

Argued for the Lord Advocate;—This was not an action against a person for penalties where the person might or might not be innocent, but the mere statement of the fact that the conveyance had been illegally used was sufficient to entitle the Crown to seize it. The Act was peremptory, and there was no hint that an averment of knowledge should be made. But even on the question of hardship the Legislature had kept in view the case of owners whose conveyances were used without their knowledge, because by the 209th section of the Act the Commissioners of Customs might direct the restoration of seized articles, whether forfeiture had been ordered or not. Further, the person whose conveyance had been seized had a right of recourse against the wrongdoer.[1] The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary had nothing to do with the present case, as they were cases where an action for penalties was directed against a person. They should not be looked at in the case, and any argument founded on them and on the opinions therein delivered was irrelevant. This section had been in force and acted on for two centuries, and was only re-enacted by the Consolidation Act of 1876.[2] If some such enactment were not in force it would be impossible in the great majority of cases even to make a seizure, as the owner of a conveyance would take care that there was no proof of knowledge on his part when it was used for an illegal purpose.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a proceeding in rem, and the sole object of it is to give effect to the forfeiture of a cab and horse. The success of the application of course must depend on the terms of the statute providing for forfeiture. The words of section 202 of the statute are that "all ships, boats, carriages, or other conveyances, together with all horses and other animals and things made use of in the importation, landing, removal, or conveyance of any uncustomed, prohibited, restricted, or other goods liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts, shall be forfeited." Now, these words admit of no construction but one. If certain things,—among others cabs and horses,—are used to convey uncustomed goods, the statute provides that they shall be forfeited. It is not necessary to make any allegation against any person to the effect that he has committed an illegal act. The mere fact that the cab and horse have been used in the particular manner referred to in the statute is a sufficient ground for forfeiture. Now, the Information here alleges that certain officers of Her Majesty's Customs did seize and arrest the cab and horse described in the appraisement of seizure, and which are now claimed by Crookshanks; and the charge is to the effect that "on the 26th day of March 1888, at or near Lavan Point, near Gourock, in the county of Renfrew, the said cab and horse were made use of by John Smith, cabman, Greenock, presently a prisoner awaiting trial in the prison of Edinburgh, or other person or persons to Her Majesty's Advocate unknown, in the importation, landing, removal, or conveyance of 343 pounds weight or thereby of manufactured tobacco, or other uncustomed, prohibited, or restricted goods liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts, contrary to section 202 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 36), whereby the said cab and horse became forfeited or liable to forfeiture." The words of the count correspond precisely with the words of the statute. That being so, it is not possible to say that the charge is not relevant under the statute. No doubt it may be said that there is great hardship in certain cases, and in some cases it may be so great that the officers charged with the administration of this branch of the law will not go on to enforce the provisions of the statute. We, however, have to administer the statute according to its strict terms, and if we find the charge corresponding precisely to the words of the statute, is it to be listened to for a moment that the Lord Advocate is not entitled to prove the allegations which he has made and if he proves them to obtain the forfeitures he has claimed under the statute? I do not think there is anything more to be said. I agree with the Solicitor-General that the cases of proceedings to enforce penalties against persons have very little to do with this question. Most of these cases have to do with the particular words of the statutes under which the proceedings are taken. Some of these require guilty knowledge, others do not. Here the penalty follows on the fact that the goods have been used in a particular way, and no question of innocence on the part of anyone arises. Accordingly the reclaiming note must be refused.

LORD MURE.—I see no alternative but to hold that this action is relevant. The words of the statute are quite explicit, and nothing whatever is said there about an averment of knowledge.

The statute is very strict, and I cannot help saying that this is on the face of it about as hard a case as could well be, for I see that the servant took up this tobacco in the street in the ordinary course of his duty, and having been tried before a jury for a breach of the Customs Acts he was unanimously acquitted, and yet the Crown goes on with this case.

LORD SHAND.—The words of the statute founded on are plain and unambiguous, all vehicles "made use of" in the conveyance of uncustomed goods shall be liable to forfeiture. The argument for the reclaimer is, that the Court shall read into the statute, after the words "made use of," the words "with the knowledge of the owner of the illegal use thereof," or some similar words, requiring proof of guilty knowledge on the part of the owner as a condition of forfeiture of the vehicle. But there are no such terms in the statute, and from beginning to end of the clause I see nothing to indicate by way of implication or inference that anything of the kind was intended. There has been nothing pointed to from beginning to end of the statute itself which could lead to the idea that by implication, necessary or even slight, the guilty knowledge of the owner or of his servants was to be made a condition of the forfeiture of the vehicle used. Indeed, the only way in which it appears to me that an argument has been rendered possible in the case,—and we have had an able argument,—has been by those references which have been made to the general principles of equity and justice which appear to me to have no place in interpreting the unambiguous language of the statute. And, therefore, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that this complaint is relevant, and also that the defence set up cannot be allowed to go to proof. If the Crown can shew that the reclaimer's horse and cab were de facto used for the illegal purpose alleged, they were entitled to seize them as forfeited.

I do not agree in thinking that this is necessarily a case of hardship. If such words were inserted in the statute as the defender seeks to have introduced, the result, as it appears to me, would be that it would be impossible in probably ninety out of a hundred cases to give the check or remedy of forfeiture which it is the purpose of the Legislature to provide in order to prevent smuggling. The illegal proceedings of the smuggler are always conducted with the greatest secrecy, and a person about to allow his ship or his cab to be used in this way, if forfeiture were made to depend on his guilty knowledge, would take very good care to avoid having knowledge, and certainly would take care that there should be no means of proving his knowledge of the use which was to be made of his property. Accordingly, to avoid this evil, and yet to provide the sharp and ready remedy of forfeiture, proof of illegal use has been made sufficient.

On the other hand, however, seeing that this is so, the Legislature have as a protection to the subject placed the administration of the statute in the hands of a public department subject to the control of Parliament, and while, on the one hand, section 202 is enacted in order to obtain convictions, and to authorise forfeitures which are necessary for Exchequer purposes, on the other hand we find a clause (section 209) which expressly enables the Commissioners of Customs in the administration of the statute, even if they obtain a conviction or a forfeiture of property, to give up penalties and forfeited articles, and thus in the end to decline to avail themselves of the legal proceedings which they may have thought fit to take. That is the protection which the Legislature has provided as a counterpart to the sharp remedies of penalties and forfeitures which the statute gives for the sake of securing that the revenue of the country shall not be diminished by smuggling.

In regard to what has fallen from Lord Mure as to this being a case of hardship, I shall only say that this refers to a matter which has no doubt been well considered by those who are in the administration of this department, and by the Lord Advocate, and I express no opinion upon it. It may be that they have good reason to know the knowledge of this cab-proprietor of the use to which his horse and cab were put, though the statute does not make it a condition of the forfeiture that this shall be proved. We have no means whatever of knowing how this stands, and I express no opinion about it further than this, that if Crookshanks can satisfy the department of his complete ignorance and freedom from blame, he will have a favourable case for an appeal to the Commissioners to exercise the powers given to them by section 209 of the statute.

Lord Adam.—We cannot dispose of this case on a consideration of general principles of justice as we are asked to do. We have to construe the terms of an Act of Parliament, and on that point I have no doubt or difficulty that forfeiture must follow.

No doubt it would be easy to figure endless cases of hardship under this section, but the answer to that is that the Legislature has provided a public body which will see that there is no hardship really done in any case.

Whether this is a hard case I give no opinion whatever. We do not know the facts, and therefore I say nothing upon the subject.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Alleged condonation pending reclaiming note against decree of divorce—Process.—A husband brought an action for divorce against his wife, founding on several alleged acts of adultery. The Lord Ordinary granted divorce, holding one of the alleged acts of adultery, but one only, to be proved. The defender reclaimed, and at the hearing moved to be allowed to aver, and to prove, that the pursuer had, after the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, condoned the adultery (assuming it to have been committed) by resuming cohabitation with her. The Court were of opinion that so long as the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor granting divorce stood, the plea of condonation was excluded, but having on a consideration of the evidence come to the conclusion that the act of adultery which the Lord Ordinary held to be proved was not proved, they recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and, without expressing any opinion regarding the other acts of alleged adultery, allowed the defender to plead, and to lead evidence of, condonation.

Husband and Wife—Proof—Divorce—Condonation.—In an action of divorce on the ground of adultery, while it is competent to lead evidence of misconduct on the part of the defender prior to condonation in order to shew the character of the defender's subsequent actings, which are admitted or proved as facts, but are in themselves capable of being regarded in different lights, it is not competent to refer to such previous misconduct as evidence of the facts themselves.

Husband and Wife—Proof—Divorce—Evidence of young child.—In a proof in an action for divorce on the ground of adultery, the Lord Ordinary rejected the evidence of a boy nearly seven years of age, "in respect of his tender years and of the nature of the case." Opinion that the evidence had rightly been rejected.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

ON 1st November 1887 Andrew Robertson brought an action against his wife Margaret Stalker or Robertson for divorce on the ground of adultery alleged to have been committed with various men named.

The defender denied the alleged adultery.

At the proof on 13th December the pursuer led evidence in support of his averments of adultery, and the defender led counter evidence.

The pursuer put in two letters written by the defender, admitting adultery on earlier occasions, which he had condoned. The defender admitted writing the letters, but denied the adultery.

The proof was adjourned till 10th January 1888, on which date the pursuer was allowed to open up his record in order to make an additional averment, and the defender to answer it, and the proof was further adjourned till 13th January.

The following was the additional averment and answer:—(Cond. 11) "The defender committed adultery in a cab belonging to and driven by John Doull, . . . in or about the month of September last, whilst being driven round the Queen's Drive, Edinburgh, with a man other than the pursuer, whose name and designation are unknown to, and cannot be discovered by, the pursuer." (Ans. 11) "Denied."

At the adjourned proof Doull, the cabman mentioned in the additional averment, deponed,—" I am a cab-driver, and my cab belongs to me. . . . I know the parties to this case. I at one time lived in St Patrick Square, below where they lived. I know Mrs Robertson quite well by sight. (Shewn defender)—That is the lady. I remember a man hiring my cab at the Register House on one occasion in September last. I do not know the man, and could not identify him. The defender was with him. It was between six and seven o'clock in the evening. The man hired my cab for an hour's drive, but he did not say where. He went into the cab, as did also Mrs Robertson. The two were alone in the cab. I took them round the Queen's Drive." He then deponed that in going up the hill towards Dunsappie he got off his box in order to relieve his horse, and walked by the side of the cab, when he saw the defender and the man in the act of connection. He further deponed that he mentioned the matter to a man named Fitzpatrick, through whom it came to the knowledge of the pursuer's agent. Fitzpatrick and the agent were examined and corroborated this last statement. There was no other evidence for the pursuer regarding the alleged act of adultery in Doull's cab.

The defender was further examined for herself, and denied the alleged adultery in Doull's cab. She stated that she had never been round the Queen's Drive in a cab in her life. "I certainly was never driven in Doull's cab round the Queen's Drive. Cross.—I know Doull by sight. I have known him in that way for about three years I think. He lived in the same stair where I lived."

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner) on 13th January 1888 granted decree of divorce, finding that she had " committed adultery with a man other than the pursuer, whose name and designation are unknown to the pursuer, as libelled."

There was no note or opinion appended to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but it was admitted that the Lord Ordinary expressed the opinion that he held that the alleged adultery in Doull's cab was proved, and that the acts of adultery averred in the record as originally framed were not proved.

The defender reclaimed.

At the hearing on March 14th the defender stated that the pursuer had since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor resumed cohabitation with her, and had thereby condoned the adultery on which he founded (assuming that there had been adultery, which the defender denied), and she moved the Court to be allowed to open up the record in order to aver this condonation, and for a proof of the averment when added to the record.

Lord Young pointed out that the first matter to be considered was whether the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was well founded, for if the Court affirmed that interlocutor, holding the adultery on which the Lord Ordinary had proceeded to be proved, the date of the divorce would be the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and consequently the plea of condonation would be excluded; but if the Court recalled that interlocutor, holding the adultery on which the Lord Ordinary had proceeded not to be proved, should the Court be of opinion that any of the other acts of alleged adultery were proved, then it would be open to the defender to plead condonation.

The defender then argued that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was ill founded. It affirmed an act of adultery on the uncorroborated testimony of Doull, the cabman. The defender denied that she had ever been in Doull's cab on the Queen's Drive.

Argued for the pursuer;—Doull's evidence was no doubt the only direct evidence of the act of adultery to which he spoke, but it was corroborated in the first place by the evidence of acts of adultery which the pursuer had condoned, and secondly by the evidence adduced in support of the other acts of alleged adultery, which, even if it did not prove any of those acts of adultery, shewed sufficiently the character of the defender. That was competent evidence.[1]

The pursuer argued, further, that the evidence of a boy named Robert Macdonald, whom he had tendered as a witness in support of one of the other acts of adultery, had been incompetently rejected by the Lord Ordinary, and that he ought now to be allowed to examine him.*

LORD YOUNG.—A difficulty was suggested at an early stage of the debate in consequence of the defender's allegation that cohabitation had been resumed standing the decree of divorce by the Lord Ordinary. With the view of avoiding, if possible, the argumentative difficulties thence arising, counsel for the reclaimer was invited to open on the reclaiming note and to state the grounds on which he maintained that the Lord Ordinary's judgment was not well founded. That he accordingly did, and his statement was answered by the respondent.

The Lord Ordinary, by the interlocutor under review, has found an act of adultery to be proved which was not libelled nor stated in the record as originally framed at all, nor known to the pursuer when the action was raised, but was added to the record after the evidence relating to the acts of adultery which were libelled had been led, and in respect of that act has found the defender guilty of adultery, and granted decree of divorce against her accordingly. I think the first question for us to consider is whether that interlocutor is well founded.

Now, on looking at the evidence, it appears that the fact so affirmed by the Lord Ordinary, and on which alone his decree is based, stands on the unsupported testimony of a single witness—a cabman—who says that he took the defender and a man round the Queen's Drive in his cab in September last, and that having got down in order to relieve his horse when going up the hill to Dunsappie, he looked into the cab and saw them having connection. The defender is examined with reference to this, and she entirely denies the whole story, stating that she never drove round the Queen's Drive in her life. The cabman is quite distinct that she was the woman—he knew her before, he says—but who the man was he did not and does not now know. His story is quite distinct, but it is not corroborated. Mr Thomson argued that by way of corroboration he was entitled to refer to evidence of the defender's conduct otherwise, and, in particular, to her admissions of acts of adultery condoned, and also to evidence of acts which she does not admit, and which were held not proved by the Lord Ordinary; and he referred to the case of Collins, 9 R. 785, and in the House of Lords, 11 R. (H.L.) 19, as shewing that condoned acts of adultery may competently be referred to as evidence of acts which are not condoned. I remember the case, and I adhere to the views which I there held, and I think expressed, that such evidence may legitimately be referred to as interpreting the woman's conduct on other occasions, when that conduct may be regarded as guilty or innocent according to circumstances. Walking alone in a park with a man, or sitting with him, if she is a virtuous woman, would not give rise even to a momentary suspicion, but if she is a vicious woman, given to going about with men, it would be quite otherwise. Therefore, to interpret conduct of this sort, such evidence—evidence of the woman's previous conduct and habits—is quite legitimate. But the question here is not as to the character of her conduct in the cab, but whether there is evidence which we can regard as sufficient that she was in the cab at all with this man, and evidence of acts of condoned adultery or of previous conduct of a doubtful character can have no bearing as evidence of that fact. It stands therefore on the uncorroborated testimony of the cabman, and, differing from the Lord Ordinary, I am of opinion that the adultery which that testimony, if sufficiently corroborated, would have established, has not been proved. Accordingly I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled.

That being so, we have to consider whether the evidence which the Lord Ordinary rejected as insufficient to establish the acts of adultery on the other occasions referred to on record is sufficient to establish one or more of these acts. For myself I should be slow to interfere with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, rejecting that evidence as insufficient, but the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary affirming the fact of adultery on a particular occasion, and granting decree of divorce accordingly, having been recalled, we cannot, in face of the averments as to condonation which are now made, enter into an inquiry as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence of the other acts of alleged adultery, without allowing the new matter to be added to the case. I should therefore propose, if your Lordships agree with me, to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and to allow the defender to add the statement she proposes to the record, and the pursuer to make such answer as he thinks fit, and that having been done, to allow a proof.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the present state of the record I think it right to say no more than that I concur.

LORD YOUNG.—I omitted to mention what I think we all considered, that I do not think we should interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary in refusing to allow the child to be examined. I should certainly have done the same had I been Lord Ordinary.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note for the defender against Lord Trayner's interlocutor of 13th January 1888, and on the minute for the defender, No. 79 of process [being the averment of condonation], recall the said interlocutor, and allow the pursuer to answer the said minute."

The minute and answer were thereafter added to the record, and a Lease—Landlord and Tenant—Subject of lease—Implied obligation—Breach of contract.—Certain premises in a densely populated part of Glasgow, known as "Graham's Lodging House," were let on lease for seven years. After four years of the lease had run, the landlord, who owned an adjacent block of buildings, converted it into and started a rival lodging-house. There was no express condition in the lease against his so doing. The tenant brought an action of damages against the landlord on the ground that the landlord's actings were in violation of the good faith of the contract.

Held after a proof, by a majority of the whole Court (diss. Lord Lee), that the lease in favour of the pursuer implied no obligation on the part of the landlord not to set up a rival establishment.

Opinions that such a restriction could not be implied from the circumstances in which a lease was granted. Opinions contra per Lord Lee and Lord Fraser.

BY lease dated January 1883, Gavin Bell Millar, sole partner of the firm of W. & G. Millar, warehousemen, Glasgow, let to Thomas Craig certain subjects, which were described as being "All and Whole these premises, situated in Graeme Street, Watson Street, and M'Pherson Street, Glasgow, as presently occupied as Graham's Lodging House," for seven years from Whitsunday 1883. The rent stipulated in the lease was £400 per annum, and the tenant paid in addition the price of certain wooden partitions and other fixtures on the premises. Millar was taken bound to maintain the subjects of lease in good tenantable order and condition; and "whatever repairs, alterations, fittings, decorations or others may be necessary or desirable for the second party's" (the tenant's) "occupancy of the premises, shall be made at his own expense, but he shall not be entitled to make any alterations on the premises let without the express consent of the first party; declaring that the first party shall, at the termination of the lease, if required by the second party, purchase from him at a valuation the bunks or sleeping-berths to be erected and fitted up by the second party." The landlord was further taken bound to maintain the tenant in the peaceable possession and occupation of the premises.

The premises in question, which continued to be used as a lodging-house, and consisted of three flats, containing 300 beds, were part of a block of buildings which were bounded on the south by Gallowgate, on the west by High Street, on the east by Watson Street, and on the north by Graeme Street,—a cross street called M'Pherson Street separating them from another block of buildings fronting Watson Street, in which were premises also owned by W. & G. Millar, and occupied by them as furniture and carpet stores in connection with their business.

In September 1886 Millar converted these stores into a lodging-house, called the Watson Street Home, and fitted them up with 512 beds, and let them at a rent of £1000 per annum to a man named Robert Burns.

Craig v. Millar.

Craig thereupon brought this action against Gavin Bell Millar, claiming £4000 of damages, and pleading—(1) The defender Gavin Bell Millar's actings in converting the said warehouse premises into, and opening the Watson Street Home or lodging-house as condescended on, being in violation and breach of the good faith of the contract made between the defenders and the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to reparation, as concluded for. (2) The pursuer is, in the circumstances condescended on, justly entitled to reparation for the loss, injury, and damage caused or to be caused to him by the said actings of the defenders, and decree in his favour, as concluded for, falls accordingly to be pronounced.

He averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 4) "At the time when the pursuer entered into said lease there was no rival house in the neighbourhood. Had there been any such the pursuer would not have leased the defenders' premises. . . . The pursuer put up fittings and made certain improvements and alterations at a cost of upwards of £1000. He devoted his whole energies towards improving the business, and under his own and his wife's superintendence it has been carried on with profit by the pursuer until the business was interfered with and seriously damaged by the defender, Gavin Bell Millar, as after mentioned. The premises tenanted by the pursuer were specially fitted up, and the contract of lease entered into by both parties in order to supply the demand for accommodation of the kind referred to in said quarter of the city. Being well conducted by the pursuer the business soon shewed a considerable profit, and this came to the knowledge of the defender Gavin Bell Millar. He then resolved, in breach of the good faith of the pursuer's contract with him, to transform a part of the warehouse in which the business of W. & G. Millar was carried on, and of which he is proprietor, into a common lodging-house, with the express view of securing the custom, or a great part thereof, which was being obtained in the same block of buildings by the pursuer." . . . (Cond. 6) "The opening of the said Watson Street lodging-house by the defender the said Gavin Bell Millar was a violation and breach of the said contract with the pursuer. Owing to the proximity of said house to that of the pursuer, and to there not being a demand for two such immense establishments, the pursuer's business has greatly suffered, and, so far as he can judge, it will be impossible for him to continue to carry it on. As already mentioned, the pursuer's business had yielded large profit prior to defenders' said interference therewith. Not only is this profit no longer earned, but the pursuer's drawings have already decreased to such an extent that, assuming they should not continue further to decrease, he is making a loss at the rate of nearly £600 a-year. This is entirely owing to the defenders' said actings as above mentioned. The damages claimed are a moderate estimate of the loss thus occasioned which the pursuer has sustained and will sustain before his lease terminates. The defenders have declined to make him any compensation for this loss."

The defender in answer "denied that at the time when the pursuer entered into his lease there was no rival house in the neighbourhood; that the defenders took any resolution in breach of the good faith of their contract with the pursuer; and that they transformed their warehouse into a lodging-house with the express view of securing the pursuer's custom." He further stated that, in answer to the pursuer's representations, he had offered to relieve him of his lease, or to fit up his premises in the same style as the new premises, provided he paid interest on the cost of the alterations, but that both offers had been declined.

He pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant, and insufficient to support his pleas. (2) The defender having committed no breach of contract is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Lee) on 16th February 1887 allowed a proof before answer,* and on 5th March following, the First Division upon a reclaiming note adhered to that interlocutor.

* "OPINION.—This is an action of damages at the instance of the tenant of a common lodging-house against his landlord, for injury by the latter setting up a rival establishment to the prejudice of his tenant, and contrary to the good faith of the lease.

"The allegation is that the defenders, after letting the premises to the pursuer at a high rent, for a period of seven years, and for the purposes of a common lodging-house, have converted a neighbouring tenement belonging to them into a similar lodging-house, with the view of intercepting the custom to which the pursuer (as in a question between him and his landlord) was entitled to trust. If the pursuer's statements are true, the defenders have acted in bad faith, and have endeavoured to conceal or disguise the character in which they are connected with the rival establishment, by means of a nominal and fictitious lease to a third party, who works the business for their behoof, and undertakes to pay them a nominal rent of £1000 a-year.

"It is pleaded that the action is irrelevant, and that, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary in the contract of lease, the proprietor was entitled to make any use he pleased of the neighbouring tenements belonging to him.

"My opinion is that the action cannot be thrown out as irrelevant. The relation of landlord and tenant involves on both sides important obligations, which are not necessarily made matter of express agreement; and I think that, on the part of the landlord, it is not doubtful that he is bound, not merely to give the tenant peaceable possession and occupation, and to maintain him therein, but also to refrain from doing anything which is calculated to disturb him in using the subjects for the purpose for which they were let.

"It is true that in the case of Laurent v. The Lord Advocate (7 M. 607) it was held that a neighbouring proprietor is not liable for injury caused to his neighbour by lawful operations in suo, unless negligently, recklessly, or unskilfully executed. But the question there, according to the issue adjusted, was not between landlord and tenant. Lord Deas' view was held to be excluded by the terms of the issue. In the case of Miller v. Renton (13 R. 309) it was not doubted that one who has let premises for occupation as a hotel will be liable in damages caused by the landlord to his tenant by operations in an adjoining tenement calculated to disturb the tenant's occupancy of the subjects for the purposes for which they were let. The result in that case was that the landlord was found liable in damages for disturbance caused by operations on his neighbouring tenement.

"But another example, very near to the present case, of the obligations which may be implied in a lease, is to be found in the case of Smith v. Cameron, referred to in the case of that name reported in 6 R. 1107.† In that case Lord

† The case of Catherine Smith, lessee and tenant of the Chevalier Hotel, Fort-William, v. John Cameron, proprietor of said hotel, and also of the hotel known as the "West End Hotel," Fort-William, and Donald M'Intosh, lessee of the last-mentioned hotel, is reported upon another point, of date 28th June 1879, 6 R. 1107.

Upon the merits of the case the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Craighill), dated 25th March 1879, which was not reclaimed against, fully sets forth the facts. His Lordship had, on 12th November 1878, pronounced an interlocutor allowing a proof, which on a reclaiming note had been adhered to by the First Division on 30th November.

The subsequent interlocutor of 25th March 1879 was as follows:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the closed record, productions, and proof, and having considered the debate and whole process, in the first place, as regards the case against the defender, John Cameron, finds, as Craighill gave the lessee of the Chevalier Hotel, Fort-William, £500 of damages against her landlord, on the ground that, contrary to the good faith of his contract with her, he had opened a rival hotel in the place. The opinion of the Court in the case of Campbell v. Watt, reported in Hume's Decisions (p. 788), is also in point, as shewing that there are restraints which are natural incidents to a lease, and among these that the landlord of an inn should not set up a rival establishment of the same kind to the prejudice of his tenant. I think, therefore, that it is a question of circumstances, whether that which has been done by the defender in the present case is contrary to the good faith of his agreement with the pursuer, and that there must be inquiry.

"With regard to the import of the English cases upon the effect of a sale of goodwill, I hesitate to express any opinion, and I think it unnecessary to do so. But I may say that, in any view of them, they shew that a contract of that nature may imply some restraints upon the vendor which are not made matter of express stipulation. They seem to recognise the principle that one who sells goodwill 'shall not be permitted to derogate from his own grant.' I cannot find that they support the defenders' arguments that the action should be thrown out without inquiry."

matters of fact (1) that after communications between the pursuer and defender relative to the Chevalier Hotel, Fort-William, of which at the time defender was occupant and owner, the pursuer took a lease of that hotel from the defender for a period of ten years from Whitsunday 1876, subject to a break in her favour at the end of the first five, at a yearly rent of £310, which, if not a high, was at anyrate a full rent for the premises; (2) that the pursuer entered on possession at Whitsunday 1876, and since then the business of this hotel has been carried on by the pursuer, who has kept up the character of the house as a 'first-class' hotel; (3) that early in June 1878 a new hotel, since known as the West End Hotel, was opened in Fort-William by the defender Donald M'Intosh, who, in November 1877, had contracted with the proprietor, the other defender, the said John Cameron, for a lease thereof for seven years from Whitsunday 1878, in premises which, before the building was altered and enlarged by the last-named defender, was the parish school of Kilmallie; (4) that the West End Hotel, which is within 200 yards of the Chevalier Hotel, occupies a conspicuous situation, and one convenient for travellers, and between the time when it was opened, which, as aforesaid, was early in June 1878, and the 7th September following, which is near to the close of the tourist season, the number of sleepers in the said hotel was 543, the number of sleepers in the Chevalier Hotel during the year 1878 being 890; (5) that of the said number who slept in the West End Hotel, one-half at least may, on reasonable computation, be regarded as travellers who would have gone to and who would have been accommodated in the Chevalier Hotel had the former not been established, there being no other house so directly in rivalry with the latter as the West End Hotel; (6) that the average sum paid by each sleeper in such a hotel as the Chevalier Hotel or West End Hotel is about 10s.; that the average profit to the landlord is one-half the visitor's bill; and that the loss caused to the pursuer by the opening of the West End Hotel, as represented by the facts last particularised, approaches to £70 in the tourist season of 1878; (7) that the season of 1878 may, as regards the effect of the competition of the West End Hotel with the Chevalier Hotel, be fairly taken to exhibit the result of that competition during all the future years of the pursuer's tenancy of the latter hotel, and consequently the loss suffered and to be suffered by the pursuer during the eight years of her lease to run from Whitsunday 1878, should she so long continue in the tenancy, may be stated, and will not be overstated, at the sum of £500; (8) that the premises which now form the West End Hotel were purchased by the defender the said John Cameron in October 1875, and one of the purposes which he desired to accomplish by this acquisition was to prevent them from falling into the hands of another bidder at the roup, by whom, as the defender had been informed, they were to be converted into a hotel had he become the purchaser; (9) that in January, February, and March 1876, when the parties were in communication as to the pursuer becoming tenant of the Chevalier Hotel, when the parties came to terms for a lease, and when the formal lease was signed, the defender, though it was in his mind that the premises which he had recently acquired as aforesaid might be converted into and let or used as a hotel, said nothing on this subject to the pursuer, who in consequence became tenant of the Chevalier Hotel as aforesaid, ignorant and unsuspicious of the probability or possibility of such a competition; and (10) that the letting for the purposes of a hotel of the premises known now as the West End Hotel by the defender was a violation of the good faith of the contract previously entered into with the pursuer: Finds, as matter of law, the facts being as above set forth, that the defender is liable to the pursuer in reparation of the loss caused as aforesaid to the pursuer in the premises; therefore repels the defences: Ordains the said defender John Cameron to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £500 sterling, by equal yearly instalments, beginning payment of the first of these instalments as at Martinmas 1878, the second at Martinmas 1879, and so forth, making payment yearly thereafter during the pursuer's tenancy of the Chevalier Hotel under the said lease, but no longer, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date of payment of each instalment until paid, and decerns: In the second place, as regards the case against the defender Donald M'Intosh, finds, as matter of fact, that there was no privity of contract between him and the pursuer, and that in being tenant of the West End Hotel he did not violate any obligation, express or implied, contracted with or in relation to the pursuer: Finds, as matter of law, the fact being as above set forth, that the said defender is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons for interdict, and from any of the other conclusions by which he is or might be affected; therefore assoilzies the said defender, but finds, for the reasons set forth in the subjoined note, no expenses due to him by the pursuer, and decerns: Finds the defender the said John Cameron liable to the pursuer in the expenses of process, including those incurred in the Inner-House on the reclaiming note presented by the defenders against the interlocutor of 12th November last: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and to report.

"NOTE.—If the facts be as they have been found by the Lord Ordinary, there is he thinks both principle and authority in the law of Scotland for the judgment which has been pronounced. The decision in Campbell v. Watt, reported by Hume, p. 788, appears to be a decision on the very question which has now been determined. A single decision, indeed, is not conclusive evidence of the law, but that quoted has often been referred to as an authority, and certainly there is no subsequent decision nor dictum by which its soundness has been impugned. Apart from this consideration, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, assuming the setting up of the West End Hotel to have involved a violation on the part of the defender Cameron of the good faith of his contract with the pursuer, there can hardly be discovered a way of escape from the conclusion that, for the breach of what in this view must be regarded as an implied condition of the lease to the pursuer, reparation must be awarded.

"The amount to which the pursuer is entitled depends upon the evidence; and the sum for which decree has been given is, the Lord Ordinary thinks, reasonable, and certainly not extravagant reparation, according to the facts which, in his view of the matter, have been established.

"The reasons for which the defender, Donald M'Intosh, though assoilzied, has not been allowed expenses, are, that he has throughout made common cause with his landlord, the other defender; and that, as a consequence, he has failed on both of the pleas which, on his behalf as well as on behalf of the defender Cameron, have been set forth on the record."

ments regarding, them. Accordingly the defender entered into a lease of the second premises with a man named Robert Burns, at a rent nominally of £1000, it being arranged that the whole proceeds of the business should be received by a cashier nominated by the defender and applied—with the exception of a salary of £150 to Burns—(1) in extinction of the defender's claim for furnishings, and (2) after payment of that debt as profit to be paid in equal shares to the defender and Burns.

In view of the decision ultimately pronounced by the Court, it is unnecessary to refer to the evidence further than it will appear from the Lord Ordinary's judgment, from the arguments as stated in the minutes of debate for the parties, which are summarised below, and from the opinions of the Judges.

On 28th June 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—" Finds (1) That in 1883 the defender let to the pursuer certain premises in Graeme Street of Glasgow, known as 'Graham's Lodging House,' for seven years from Whitsunday 1883, at a rent of £400 per annum, in terms of the lease No. 176 of process, stipulating that the price of the wooden partitions and others should be paid for in half-yearly instalments of £30 each, and that whatever repairs, alterations, or fittings should be necessary or desirable for the pursuer's occupancy should be made at his own expense, and that he should not be entitled to make alterations on the premises let without the express consent of the defender, but declaring that the defender at the termination of the lease should, if required by the pursuer, purchase from him the bunks or sleeping berths to be erected by him; (2) That for the five years previous to Whitsunday 1883, and from the time when the tenement was erected by the defender, the said premises had been occupied as a common lodging-house, and during the three years ending 31st May 1886 the said premises continued to be well frequented, and yielded an average profit of £520 per annum or thereby; (3) That in the spring of 1886 the defender, being also proprietor of an adjoining tenement, previously occupied as a warehouse, converted it into a common lodging-house of the same kind, fitted it up with 512 beds, and made arrangements for its occupation as such for a period of five years from Whitsunday 1886, in terms of the lease No. 173 of process, entered into between him and Robert Burns, formerly a manager of one of the Corporation lodging-houses; (4) That by these arrangements the defender established a new lodging-house in which he had a personal and pecuniary interest, in conflict with the pursuer's interests as his tenant in the establishment in Graeme Street, and thus entered personally into competition with his tenant in the business of a lodging-house keeper, regardless of the interests and remonstrances of the pursuer; (5) That the institution by the defender of this new home or common lodging-house, which was opened about 13th September 1886, had the effect of diminishing the receipts of the pursuer from his establishment, during the eight months ending 13th May 1887, to the extent of not less than £220, as compared with an average of the corresponding periods of eight months in the previous years of the lease, and has thus been to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer; (6) That the defender's said arrangements were contrary to the good faith of the contract of lease between him and the pursuer, and in breach of the implied obligations incident to said contract; and finds in law that the defender is liable to the pursuer in damages: Assesses the damages at the sum of £1000 sterling: Ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuer of said sum by four equal yearly instalments of £250, beginning as at Whitsunday 1887, and so on yearly at each term of Whitsunday until the expiry of the pursuer's lease, with interest on each instalment from the date of payment at the rate of five per cent per annum until paid, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

The defender reclaimed.

After counsel had been heard on the reclaiming note, the Court "in respect of the general importance of the question involved," appointed the parties "to prepare, print, and box to the Judges of this Division, and of the Second Division, and to the permanent Lords Ordinary, mutual minutes of debate, in order to the opinion of the whole Judges being obtained on the question raised by the record."

The defender and reclaimer in his minute of debate argued as follows:—The pursuer, who complained of the violation of an implied stipulation of the lease, must formulate the implied stipulation. Was it a prohibition against occupancy as a lodging-house imposed as a negative servitude upon other buildings owned by the defender at the date of the lease? and, if so, did the servitude apply to all property in the neighbourhood owned by the defender? and within what limits was it enforceable? Or was the stipulation of the nature of a personal restriction binding only on the defender? Such considerations shewed the difficulties of the pursuer's case. If his contention were well-founded the value of his lease would, to a large extent, depend on the amount of other property which the landlord might have in the neighbourhood, for third parties might set up any number of rival establishments and injure his rights. And yet there would be nothing in the lease itself to indicate what the tenant's position in this respect was. It was impossible to suppose that so important and valuable a right —if it existed—should be left to implication, or that no consideration should be given for it. Further, was the stipulation to be implied only in the case of premises let for inns or lodging-houses, and was it to be implied irrespective of locality, e.g., equally in country districts and in a city? It

* "OPINION.—I have no hesitation in finding that the proof establishes the facts set forth in the interlocutor now pronounced. The most material of them are extracted from the evidence afforded by the defender himself, and by the lease entered into with his tenant Burns.

"In this state of the facts, I am of opinion that the cases of Campbell v. Watt (Hume's Dec. p. 788), and Smith v. Cameron (referred to in 6 R. 1107), are direct authorities against the defender's conduct.

"The contention that the defender was entitled to act as he did because his lease to the pursuer contained no express stipulation to the contrary is not supported by any principle known to the law of Scotland, which, as I had occasion to observe in my opinion of 16th February, recognises some obligations as incident to the relation of landlord and tenant, without express stipulation.

"The defender's idea that he did all that he was called upon to do, in offering to the pursuer to take his premises off his hands, is a mistake. It involves the fallacy that he was entitled to force the pursuer either to throw up his lease and his business or to acquiesce in the defender's conduct in setting up a rival establishment of the same kind, and practically next door. It is not possible, in my opinion, to reconcile the aims and interests of the defender in his new business of a common lodging-house keeper (for such he practically became by his arrangements with Burns) with the obligations arising out of his position as the pursuer's landlord.

"In fixing the amount of damages, I think it impossible to doubt that the results shewn by the eight months ending 13th May indicate a loss of not less than £250 per annum for the last four years of the pursuer's lease, and that the defender cannot complain of the damage being assessed at once, although it has only been in part realised. I have therefore followed substantially the judgment of Lord Craighill in the case of Smith v. Cameron." was absurd to say that it extended to the case of a shop in a trading locality, yet the same principle would apply there.

The following facts were proved which negatived the pursuer's statement that when he entered into his lease there was no rival establishment in the neighbourhood. (1) At that date there were numerous lodging-houses in the central district of Glasgow, one within 230 yards of the pursuer's house containing 160 beds, and another within 550 yards containing 284 beds. (2) When the defender's house was opened there were 70 fewer lodging-houses in the central district than when the pursuer's lease commenced, and there was accommodation for 1390 fewer persons; and (3) They all derived their custom not from the immediately surrounding locality, but from more or less distant quarters of the city. If therefore there was an implied restraint such as was contended for, its limits must be co-extensive with the city. The Court would not give effect to a proposition which involved such results, and upon general grounds therefore, apart from authority, the defender maintained that the alleged implied stipulation could not be read into the contract.

With regard to the pursuer's contention that the case was concluded in his favour by authority, the defender maintained that the case of Campbell v. Watt,[1] even assuming it to have been well decided, did not apply. The principal subject let there was an inn, and the tenant was taken bound to spend £200 in building. There was a smithy in the neighbourhood, at which liquor had been in use to be sold, and in regard to which the landlord expressly obliged himself in the lease of the inn to take the tenant bound "not to sell liquor of any kind to the prejudice of the tenant" of the inn. The inn had been the regular half-way house on the main road from Glasgow to Greenock, but a few years after the commencement of the lease the line of road was altered, and a new inn was erected upon the new road, the custom being thereby withdrawn from the old inn, which was now some way off the road. The tenant of the old inn succeeded in getting an abatement of her rent to the extent of £70 a-year in respect of damage by loss of custom, the real ground of judgment being that there was such a measure of sterility in the subject of the lease as to warrant that result. There was there an express stipulation that the only building in the neighbourhood of the subject let which could possibly be used as a rival house should not be so used. The circumstances of the case therefore justified the Court in holding that the restraint contended for was a "natural incident" of the tack.

But further than that, the judgment in that case was not one which the Court would now follow. The case was decided in 1795, and it had not been followed by any authoritative judgment since that date. In Davie v. Stark,[2] cited on the other side, there was an express condition in the lease that the landlord should not let a shop in the adjoining property, also belonging to him, to anyone engaged in the same business as his tenant. That condition was violated, and the only question of law was whether the tenant could competently set off his claim for damages against the landlord's claim for rent. Watt's case was not referred to in the judgment except by Lord Ormidale, and that only for the purpose of supporting the view that a separate action for damages at the instance of the tenant was not necessary. The case of Smith v. Cameron (reported in foot-note, ante, p. 1007), was a decision in the Outer-House by Lord Craighill, which was not submitted to review, and it was not therefore authoritative, even assuming its applicability to the present case. But the circumstances there were very different, and more nearly approximated to those found in Campbell v. Watt.

[2] Davie v. Stark, July 18, 1876, 3 R. 1114.

On general principles the decision in Campbell v. Watt was open to question. If there was eviction or partial eviction from the subject-matter of a lease, without the tenant's fault, he was entitled to relief. But a diminution of return was very different. Of that the tenant took the risk, and unless it could be shewn that the landlord's acts were in themselves improper—in short, that there was delict on his part—the tenant had no remedy.[1] The pursuer founded upon a passage in Erskine's Institutes (ii. 6, 43), where it was laid down that "where the insufficiency arises from the inconsiderate or culpable act of the landlord," the latter must not only lose his rent, but also pay damages. But that passage related exclusively to the "tack of a dwelling-house," and dealt with the obligation on the landlord to deliver the subject in a habitable condition. Here the complaint was not of the insufficiency of the subject let, but of the diminution of business.

In illustration of the legal principles applicable to the case, aid might be derived from a consideration of the legal consequences which would have followed if the defender had sold to the pursuer the goodwill of the business carried on in Graham's Lodging House. The pursuer at least could not carry his rights further, and it was more natural to imply such an obligation as was here contended for in a contract of sale of the goodwill of a business than in a mere contract of location of the premises in which a business was carried on. In a contract of sale of the goodwill, the pursuer could have prevented the defender starting a rival establishment and holding it out to the public as the same business as he had sold, but he could not have prevented the defender from starting a similar business next door the very day after the sale. These two propositions were settled by a train of authorities in the English Courts, extending from the year 1810 down to 1884.[2] Lord Eldon had defined goodwill as being "nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place."[2] The only proposition which remained in doubt on the English authorities was whether, having sold the goodwill of the business, the seller was thereafter entitled to start a rival business and solicit the old customers,[3] but there was no question of that kind here. The pursuer disputed the applicability of these cases, because of "the continuing relationship," which he argued distinguished the contract of lease from that of sale. But that distinction was one of words, and not of substance. It might very well be that the contract of sale was a continuing contract, and it could not in any case be maintained that the obligations incumbent on the seller would differ according as the price was paid in full or by instalments. Besides, in two of the English cases above quoted, the relation of landlord and tenant subsisted between the parties. Although there had been no decisions in Scotland as to the mutual rights and obligations of seller and purchaser resulting from a sale of goodwill, the legal principles applicable were the same in Scotland as in England. The pursuer's position could not be better than that of a purchaser of goodwill; indeed it was worse, for in this case he had neither bought nor paid for the goodwill.

Even assuming the defender had committed a breach of contract, the Lord Ordinary had proceeded on a wrong principle in assessing the damages at £1000 payable in four yearly instalments. The breach of contract—if committed at all—was a continuing breach, and was not committed once for all. The effect of the opening of the defender's premises might be temporary and transitory, and, indeed, it was proved to be so. It was therefore wrong to assess the damages for the future as well as for the past. The case was in marked contrast in this respect to that of Stevenson.[1] The defender had not, as alleged by the pursuer, consented to the form of the award of damages adopted by the Lord Ordinary. There was no proof that the decrease in the number of lodgers complained of by the pursuer was due to the opposition of the Watson Street Home. On the question of the amount of damage the defender maintained (1) that damages could be awarded only for the period prior to the date of the proof, and (2) that the sum ought to be very much less than the Lord Ordinary's estimate.

The pursuer in his minute of debate argued as follows;—The question was whether a landlord, who has let on lease for a term of years premises occupied as a common lodging-house with an established business, for the purpose of that business being continued there, is entitled, during the currency of the lease, to set up for his own behoof, side by side with the premises so let, a rival establishment in the same line of business.

It was clear from the proof led in the case that the demand for lodging-house accommodation in the central district of Glasgow was more than fully supplied by the existing houses—including "Graham's Lodging House," or the "Central Home." The supply of lodging-houses had been taken in hand by the municipal authorities, under whom many "Model Lodging Houses" had been erected and were being conducted in many parts of the city, but none nearer than 555 yards from the pursuer's premises. There could be no reasonable anticipation on the pursuer's part of any fresh competition,—particularly at the instance of his landlord, who had done what he would certainly not have done if the premises had been possessed by himself in place of through his tenant. By the pursuer's lease the premises were let as a lodging-house, and the landlord had a veto upon any alterations which would make them fit for anything else. The pursuer expended about £200 upon the subjects, and under his management the business was increasingly successful until interfered with by the defender's action. In September 1886 that success was interfered with by the opening of the larger lodging-house under the nominal management of Burns—who in reality was the mere hand of the defender. The defender's home contained 512 beds, the pursuer's only 332, and the former was specially designed and fitted up with superior attractions and conveniences,—from baths to a brilliantly lighted concert-room,—and everything was done to attract the pursuer's customers to the new premises. That the defender was in reality the only person interested in these was clear from the terms of the lease between him and Burns,—his alleged tenant,—under which the drawings were all to go to the defender, and Burns was to receive only a salary. The true view of the relations between Burns and the defender had been taken by the Lord Ordinary in the finding in his interlocutor of the 28th June 1887. Directly the new business was started the pursuer's receipts fell off. In the succeeding year it was proved that the pursuer's lodgers were fewer than in the preceding year by 16,003. The defender's establishment, on the other hand, was full from November 1886 onwards. The loss which the pursuer had thereby suffered had been assessed by the Lord Ordinary, sitting as a jury, at £250 per annum, which was largely within the mark of actual loss as shewn by past experience, and it had been rightly so assessed. The sum was awarded in reality as a lump sum—payment of which was to be made in yearly instalments, so as to form an abatement from the rent. The defender had made no objection to that course at the time, and the matter was one entirely within the discretion of the Court.

But the question between the parties was, whether damages could or could not be awarded, and the pursuer submitted that this question should be answered in the affirmative, both on the ground of authority and on that of equity and reason. If there ever were cases in which a landlord could be held liable for inflicting damage on his tenant by breach of implied conditions, this was one. It was not necessary for a decision in the pursuer's favour that the Court should hold that a landlord would in all circumstances be liable for setting up in the same line of business as his tenant. But here the competition was personal, it was in immediate proximity, it was also unexpected, and uncalled for by local needs. It was in a business which was special, and with a tenant to whom the subjects were let for a special purpose, and who was prevented from turning them to any other purpose. The principle of the judgment in Campbell v. Watt[1] was directly applicable. The arguments for the landlord in that case—as reported by Hume—were precisely those presented by the defender in this case, and the circumstances, although not so strongly pointing to liability on the part of the landlord, were in many respects similar. It was also to be remarked that the landlord there was a singular successor in the estate, and that he offered to relieve the pursuer of her tack. The Court held that "the restraint in question was a natural incident of a tack of such a subject; and, whether conditional or not, it was in the bona fides of the transaction that the landlord should not set up a rival inn to the prejudice of his own tenant in the old one." That decision had never been questioned, and it did not in any sense depend upon the specialties founded on by the defender. On the contrary, it had been followed and approved.[2] The case of Laurent v. The Lord Advocate[3] was not an authority against that view, because, in the words of the Lord President in that case, it "raised no question as between landlord and tenant for breach of the contract of lease."

The defender, in support of his contention, betook himself to the law of England upon the subject of sales of goodwill. On that subject the law of England was in a state of uncertainty.[4] Besides, the analogy was a false one, and there was a clear distinction between a contract of sale and a contract of lease. The former was a single transaction, complete and concluded. The latter was a continuing relation, with obligations prestable by the one party against the other from the date of entry under the lease until its ish. A truer analogy was to be found in the law of partnership. Like partners, both landlord and tenant were alike interested in the success of the undertaking for which the subjects were let. In the law of partnership a partner could not, "openly or secretly, lawfully carry on for his own benefit any business in rivalry with the firm to which he belongs."[1] So the obligation incumbent upon the landlord, when the subjects became insufficient during the currency of the lease "from the inconsiderate or culpable act of the landlord," was, in the words of Mr Erskine,[2] "to make up to the tenant the full loss which he has suffered through his fault." Here the landlord had made the tenant's subjects unprofitable for the purpose for which they were let, and he could not be permitted to derogate from his own grant without repairing the wrong he had caused. It was of no consequence how the injury was done, if it was done in point of fact, and if it was direct and material, as was the case here.

The following were the opinions of the consulted Judges:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am unable to concur in the views of the Lord Ordinary. I have failed to discover in the record or the evidence any ground on which the conclusion reached can be supported.

The action is one brought by the tenant of an urban lodging-house against his landlord, not on account of anything relating to his own contract of lease, but solely on account of the use which his landlord has chosen to make of other premises belonging to him. The pursuer does not say that he has any interest, proprietary or otherwise, in these premises; but he complains that, as the object of his own contract of lease was that he should use the premises let to him as a lodging-house, his landlord came under an implied obligation not to establish, or aid in establishing, any similar institution in the immediate vicinity. He says that, by the lease of this second tenement, the defender has violated the condition on which the first was let, and that in consequence his business has been seriously injured, for which he is entitled to reparation from the defender.

It must appear, I think, from this outline, that the defender has done no more than exercise the ordinary rights of property in the ordinary way, and that it is no concern of the pursuer to what use that property has been put, unless the owner of it was under some relative contract with the pursuer, express or implied. That there is no express contract to this effect is admitted. That none such is implied, a little attention to the details will make evident.

The premises let to the pursuer are situate in a block of buildings, the greater part of which was erected by the defender. The locality is one of the most crowded quarters in Glasgow, and these premises are placed on one side of a narrow street by which this block is intersected. Nearly opposite, and on the other side of this street, are the premises which are the subject of this complaint. The lease from the defender to the pursuer is dated in 1883. It describes the premises let as "now occupied by Graham's Lodging House"; and stipulates for a rent of £400, and certain other payments in respect of fixtures in the house. Its term is seven years. The premises were certainly let as a lodging-house, but there was no restriction to this use of them in the lease.

The pursuer's venture was successful. At least he says so, and the statement appears to be true. But in 1886—three years afterwards—the defender thought there was room for a second lodging-house in the same locality, and he accordingly entered into the lease of the premises immediately opposite—of which he was also proprietor, and which he was then occupying—of which the pursuer now complains. Before doing so, he gave the pursuer an opportunity of joining in this enterprise, which he declined to do.

[2] Erskine's Insts. ii. 6, 43.

The lease of these other premises, which are let to a person of the name of Burns for five years from 1886, is produced, but it is needless to specify its terms at length, because the pursuer does not seem to have any concern with them. The premises are to be used as a lodging-house, and the defender not only stipulates for rent, but for a share of the profits also. The pursuer complains that this new lodging-house has carried off a large proportion of his custom.

As already said, I find in this narrative nothing alleged against the defender but the exercise of rights which the law allows. By granting a lease of premises within burgh, the owner does not restrict himself as to the use he may himself make of his other property, adjoining or separate. He does not undertake that no other tenant of his within the burgh shall carry on the same trade either in the vicinity or at a distance. The element of competition by other traders does not enter the contract, unless, as in the case of Davie (3 R. 1114), to which we are referred, the lessor undertakes an express obligation on that head in the written instrument. Indeed, traders within burgh are always liable to the competition of others in the same line of business. It is their normal condition. So much was this the case in former times, that the separate crafts or trades in crowded communities were generally found to frequent the same localities—partly, it may be, from early municipal regulation, but partly also for general convenience and advantage. Examples of this are familiar even at the present day.

My opinion on the general nature of this demand is not shaken by the case of Campbell v. Watt (Hume's Decisions, p. 788), on which the pursuer founds. In that case the tenant of an inn, which was a half-way house between Glasgow and Greenock, complained that the highroad having been altered by Act of Parliament, the inn had lost its custom; and that the injury to her had been increased by her landlord having built a new inn at the junction of the new with the old road.

The tenant demanded, in an action against her landlord, an abatement of her rent, which the Court allowed.

As far as this judgment proceeded on the loss caused by the diversion of the road, it admits of being supported on the doctrine of sterility, and did not depend on any unfulfilled obligation on the part of the landlord. The real damage was caused, not by any wrong done by the landlord, but by the Act of Parliament.

In so far, however, as the judgment of the Court may be supposed to have been founded on the erection of the new inn, I am of opinion that it was not well founded on principle, and I should not be disposed to follow it. For the same reason, with all respect to the Lord Ordinary in the case of Smith v. Cameron (6 R. 1107), I feel compelled to come to a different conclusion from that at which, on the authority of the case of Campbell, his Lordship arrived. At the same time I am not insensible to the fact that the hostess of the remote half-way house on the Renfrewshire road in the case of Campbell had more plausible reason to expect a practical monopoly for her establishment than the pursuer can urge for his lodging-house in the crowded centre of Glasgow.

Craig v. Millar.

The present case rests entirely on the principle of implied contract, which, even if it were not untenable on other grounds, would fail from its hopeless want of precision. It does not admit of definition. It is not represented as absolute, yet no intelligible limitations have been specified or suggested which could render it practically operative.

Neither do the facts admit of any question being raised on the law of "goodwill," as the relation between the parties was solely that of landlord and tenant.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered, and that the defender should be assoilzied.

Lord Young.—I am of opinion that the record sets forth no breach of contract or actionable wrong committed by the defender, and that therefore the action ought to have been dismissed as irrelevant. The only contract between the parties is the deed of lease produced. The construction of it—that is to say, its legal import and effect—is a question of law for the Court. It seems to be free from ambiguity, and the facts averred suggest none requiring to be cleared by extraneous evidence. I think, therefore, that parole evidence was inadmissible, and ought not to have been allowed. On the construction of the deed, I am clearly of opinion that it imports no obligation or duty on the part of the defender to abstain from opening and keeping a lodging-house in Watson Street.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lord Lee.—The interlocutor of the Court requires the opinions of the Judges "on the question raised by the record."

The principal question raised by the record is, whether it is relevant and sufficient to sustain an action of damages at the instance of a tenant against his landlord, that the latter has acted contrary to and in violation of the good faith of a certain contract of lease in setting up, to the detriment of the tenant's occupation of the subjects of lease for the purpose for which they were let, an opposition establishment for the same kind of business in the same neighbourhood?

In dealing with a question of relevancy, the general rule is to assume the truth of the averments on record. But as the question of relevancy, in my view of the evidence as expressed in the interlocutor under review, is the same as the question raised by the facts (excepting only the amount of damages), it may be understood that my opinion applies to both questions, in so far as both may be held to be included in the remit.

If I refrain from re-examining the evidence, it is because the findings in fact already pronounced sufficiently express my view of the result, and I do not find that the interlocutor authorises me to give a new opinion upon it. If I refer to the evidence at all, it will only be in deference to some of the arguments submitted to the Judges, and for the purpose of considering how far these arguments are relevant to the question raised by the record.

The contract of lease between the pursuer and the defender forms a part of the record. It is maintained on behalf of the defender that the pursuer was not thereby "taken bound to occupy the premises solely for the purpose of a common lodging-house," because there is no express obligation in these words. But the subjects are let to him "as presently occupied as Graham's Lodging House"; he is taken bound to occupy for seven years the subjects so let; he is taken bound to pay, in addition to the rent of £400, the price of the wooden partitions and fittings; and to maintain and uphold the premises, and to leave the same at the end of the lease "in the like good and tenantable order and condition, ordinary wear and tear excepted"; he is forbidden to make not only any structural alterations, but "any alterations" on the premises; and the "bunks or sleeping-berths" to be erected by him, if he requires it, are to be taken by the landlord at the termination of the lease at a valuation.

I am of opinion that under such a lease the common law of Scotland implies an obligation on the tenant to occupy the premises, during the currency of the contract, as a lodging-house; and that, without any stipulation, he is excluded by the law from converting the subjects to any other use. Upon this point, which I hold to be perfectly well settled, it is sufficient to refer to the authorities in Mr Rankine's Treatise on Leases (p. 214), and in Hunter on Landlord and Tenant (3d edition, vol. ii. p. 443), and Ivory's Notes to Erskine (ii. 6, 39). The words in which the doctrine is stated in the case of Ford v. Hillocks (1808, M. Appx. Tack, No. 17) are these,—"That it would be contrary to the bona fides of the contract to permit a tenant to convert the subjects of the lease to a purpose different from and altogether unconnected with that for which rent was stipulated." And Stair (ii. 9, 31), referring to the obligations usually incumbent on the tenant, including the use and occupation of the subjects for the purpose for which they were let, says, "all which are without express provision."

So standing the obligations of the tenant, what are the obligations of the landlord? He is bound by law not only to give the tenant possession, but to maintain and defend him "in the peaceable possession and occupation." What does this imply? I think that it implies that he undertakes to continue to the tenant the occupation of the subjects for the purposes for which they were let, undisturbed by any act of his, or for which he is responsible, and which is calculated to interfere with the tenant's use of them. There are, of course, cases of interference with the tenant's occupation for which the landlord is not responsible (Rankine, p. 202, refers to them). But if the landlord, by his own act, causes serious disturbance of the tenant's use of the premises for the purpose for which they were let (in this case making profit by using them as a common lodging-house), I am of opinion that he is liable not only to suffer abatement of rent, but to make reparation for the damage so caused. Thus it is that Erskine (ii. 6, 43), in treating of the landlord's obligation to uphold, and after stating that "where a subject is let for a particular purpose, the nature of the contract implies that it should be fitted for that purpose," lays it down that although "a slight inconveniency is not to be regarded," "where the insufficiency arises from the inconsiderate or culpable act of the landlord, he not only loses his rent, but must make up to the tenant the full loss which he has suffered through that fault." I think that this principle applies equally to the landlord's obligation to continue to his tenant the peaceable possession of the subjects for the purposes for which they were let; and the case of Miller v. Renton (13 R. 309), so far as the question with the proprietor was concerned, proceeded entirely upon this ground, viz., that the proprietor's operations upon the lower part of his property interfered with his tenant's occupation of the upper storeys for the purposes of a hotel. There was no express exclusion in that case of the landlord's right to make alterations on the lower flats, either by day or night. The question was, whether his operations were so "inconsiderate" towards his tenant (for they were not alleged to be dangerous) as to give the latter a claim of damages for loss of business. The allegations were sustained.

I cannot think that the rights of a landlord, as proprietor of subjects adjacent to a tenement which he has contracted to lease to a tenant, are altogether the same in a question with his tenant as in a question with a third party with whom he has no connection. That point was not decided in the case of Laurent v. The Lord Advocate (7 M. 607); but I concur in the opinion there expressed upon it by Lord Deas.

Now, what is the allegation in this case? It is not disputed, in the argument for the defender, that the record contains a sufficient allegation of a breach of good faith; and at all events, I think that there is such an allegation, and that, therefore, a proof was properly and necessarily allowed. But it is contended that "no evidence was led by him in support of these averments." If that could have been successfully maintained, I cannot doubt that the principal findings in fact in the interlocutor under review would have been recalled; and in my opinion there would have been an end of the case. For it is of the essence of the pursuer's case that the actings of the defender were contrary to good faith. If they were not contrary to good faith, it is not said that there was any violation of the contract. It is because they were contrary to good faith that they are alleged to have been in breach of contract.

But there are two ways in which a landlord may act contrary to the good faith of his contract of lease, viz.,—(1) by knowingly and wilfully acting to the prejudice of his tenant's rights and interests as such tenant; or (2) by what Erskine refers to as want of due consideration of these rights and interests.

The allegations of the pursuer in the present case, so far as material, and found to be proved by the interlocutor under review, appear to me to go to the former of these modes of breaking faith, and to be as follows:—

At the date of the lease, the defender—whose business was that of a warehouseman—was proprietor of a neighbouring tenement, which he occupied as a warehouse or stores. In the beginning of 1886, and while the lease had still four years to run, the defender proposed to convert his neighbouring tenement into a similar common lodging-house, with some superior attractions; and he spoke to the pursuer on the subject. The pursuer remonstrated with him, and told him that there was "no room for a house of that sort there." The defender does not deny that the pursuer said "that it would ruin him." On 21st April 1886 the defender entered into an arrangement with a person of the name of Robert Burns, the nature of which is shewn by the document No. 173 of process. It is called a "lease"; but the terms of the arrangement shew that the pursuer had grounds for his allegation in condescendence 5 that Burns was merely a nominal tenant, and that the business was truly entered upon and worked for the defender himself. The defender's statement, "Burns is merely my tenant," is contradicted by the document, and was broken down in cross-examination. These proceedings on the part of the defender are alleged to have been in violation of the good faith of the contract; and the way in which they were gone about is said to afford evidence of the breach of faith. The result of them was that the defender—a warehouseman—set up a business as a lodging-house keeper, in the neighbouring tenement, in opposition to or in competition with, his own tenant, and that the pursuer's business immediately suffered very greatly in consequence. The so-called lease to Burns, while it names a rent of £1000 per annum, shews that the whole proceeds of the business so set up were to be received by a cashier nominated by the defender, and were to be held and applied by him—with the exception of a salary of £150 to be paid to Burns—for the purposes (1) of extinction of the defender's claims on account of furniture and plenishings, &c.; and (2) "after the whole of said debt has been paid off and extinguished," of dividing the profits into two equal portions, one of which was to belong to the defender himself.

Was such a proceeding consistent with a fair or reasonable exercise by the defender of his rights as proprietor of the neighbouring tenement, or was it a violation of the good faith of the contract with the pursuer?

My opinion is that it was the latter; and I am unable to find that it was justified by the ordinary rights of a proprietor in the use of his property. The case has no resemblance, in point of fact, to the case of a street or neighbourhood occupied for a particular trade. It is the simple case of a landlord entering upon a new business, quite foreign to his own proper business, in competition with his tenant, and to the prejudice of his tenant in the occupation of subjects which have been let for a special purpose. Accordingly it was found by the interlocutor under review, as matter of fact, that "the defender's said arrangements were contrary to the good faith of the contract of lease between him and the pursuer."

But the interlocutor also found that it was in breach of the implied obligations incident to said contract. This has been referred to as if it had been found only to be a violation of the good faith of the contract because it was in breach of an implied obligation. That is not my view. I think it was a breach of the implied obligations of the contract because it was a breach of good faith.

At the same time, I remain of opinion that the case of Campbell v. Watt, reported by Baron Hume, is an authority to the effect that such a proceeding, even on the part of a singular successor, was in violation of a restraint which was a natural incident of such a lease. That case, however, is much more difficult, in my opinion, than any that arises here. For the utmost that could be said there against the defender was that he had failed to give due consideration to the contract entered into by his author. There was another specialty in that case, arising out of the fact that, owing to a change in the line of road by authority of an Act of Parliament, the inn which was the subject of lease had ceased to afford accommodation to the district, and had already lost its business by reason of a cause for which the defender was not responsible. Notwithstanding these specialties, the doctrine was laid down and applied that a restraint against erecting another inn at a short distance from the subject of lease was "a natural incident of a tack of such a subject; and that whether conditioned or not, it was in the bona fides of the transaction that a landlord should not set up a rival inn to the prejudice of his own tenant in the old one." I concur with the observation of Lord Craighill, in the note to his interlocutor in Smith v. Cameron, that the decision in Campbell v. Watt has often been referred to as an authority, and that its soundness has never been impugned; and I think that, if it had been considered of doubtful authority, and if the relevancy of the allegations in this case, and in Smith v. Cameron, depended on it, the interlocutors allowing proof would not have been affirmed, as they were.

But my opinion is that this case is much stronger against the landlord than the case of the pursuer in Campbell v. Watt, inasmuch as here the allegation is,

No. 177.

Craig v.
Millar.

and the proof shews, that there was not merely inconsiderate action on the part of the landlord, but a deliberate breach of faith.

I therefore remain of opinion that the defender is liable not merely in abatement of rent, but in the damages suffered by his tenant through his violation of the good faith of the contract.

With regard to the question which has been raised as to the assessment of the damages, my view is that this is a case in which the wrong complained of has been done, and that the consequent damage must be measured and recovered in one action. I think that the case of Stevenson v. Pontifex & Wood (15 R. 125) is an authority for, and not against, assessing the damage once for all in such a case. For the defender does not say that, consistently with his arrangement with Burns, there is any possibility of undoing the wrong, and he does not offer to undo it.

It is therefore necessary to consider whether the damages were excessive. That seems to me to be a pure question of evidence. Considering that the immediate effect of the defender's conduct was a loss of business to the pursuer during the first eight months after the defender's opposition establishment was begun to the amount of £220, I myself see no ground for supposing the sum awarded to be in excess of the loss which must have been caused. But this is a point upon which I should feel bound to concur with the majority of my brethren.

Lord Fraser.—The case for the pursuer is, that what the defender has done is contrary to an implied condition of the contract of location between them; or, as it has been otherwise put, contrary to the good faith of the contract. The doctrine of implied condition in contracts is one that is well illustrated by many decisions in our law. Few contracts contain, in express terms, all the conditions. What is expressly and specially guarded against is quod sæpius accidit; and although it is a very common, yet it is not a very good, argument to say that if it had been intended that a particular condition or restriction should be given effect to, that would have been expressed. This argument is much employed in the present case, and I think that it could not have been more improperly used. The pursuer could not have anticipated—so as to provide against it by express covenant—the ground of complaint which is the basis of this claim of damages.

Although I do not agree with the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary in this case ultimately arrived, there is one remark in the opinion appended to his interlocutor of the 16th of February 1887 with which I entirely agree. He there says,—"I think it is a question of circumstances whether that which has been done by the defender in the present case is contrary to the good faith of his agreement with the pursuer." I am clearly of opinion that no general rule can be laid down, to the effect that when a man lets a portion of his property to another, for a specific purpose, he is entitled, next morning, to let an adjoining property belonging to him, for the purpose of carrying on the same trade, and so creating a rival establishment. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that every case of this kind must be determined according to its own circumstances; and I think it would be a misfortune if we parted with the doctrine of implied condition,—or the giving redress against acts which are contrary to the good faith of the contract, though that redress be not expressly covenanted for.

Now, I consider the judgment in Campbell v. Watt, and Lord Craighill's judgment in Smith v. Cameron, to be perfectly reconcilable with the conclusion that I have arrived at—viz., that the pursuer is not entitled to the decree which he here asks. These cases were decided according to their own special circumstances. Campbell v. Watt was of a very special kind. The tenant in that case obtained a lease of an inn, stables, and a farm,—the farm consisting of various pendicles. She was taken bound to expend a sum not above £300 in building and finishing a house for an inn, upon the lands that were let,—to the satisfaction of the landlord; and for this expenditure she was to receive no interest during the running of the lease, but was only to be compensated at its expiration by the landlord. It appeared, also, that there was a smithy, which according to the custom of the times (as stated in the pleadings), was a place where ales and spirits were sold, and which was the only rival that the inn had for the sale of spirits; and the landlord obliged himself "that in any set of a smithy to be erected by him, he shall take the tenant bound not to sell liquor of any kind to the prejudice of Mrs Watt." Thus there was as clear an implication as could be, that Mrs Watt, the tenant, was to have no competition in the sale of liquors. She was to build a new inn, and the sale of liquors at the smithy was to be prevented; and the argument maintained to the Court was this, that the landlord, by requiring his tenant to build a new inn, and by obliging himself to prevent the competition of sales from the smithy, clearly came under an implied obligation that no establishment should be set up by him in competition with that new inn. There was a further argument submitted to the Court, to the effect that as a singular successor had bought the estate, he was not bound by these obligations of his predecessor; but the case did not turn upon this point. The tenant asked an abatement of rent consequent upon the diminution of custom caused by the landlord having erected a rival establishment; and she got it from the Court. Whether there is any difference between a claim for abatement of rent and a claim for damages is of no importance in my view. The case was one where, according to the express covenants of the lease, there was a plainly implied condition against the act which the landlord perpetrated.

In the pleadings for the tenant two cases are referred to, one of which is not reported, and which is stated thus in the memorial for the tenant:—"In the case of the Earl of Wemyss against Sir Archibald Hope (12th Feb. 1793), the question depended upon the following clause of a lease: The Earl of Wemyss set to Sir Archibald Hope 'All and Haill the coal and coal seams belonging to the said Earl of Wemyss, lying under and within his lands and estates of Monktonhall and Stonnyhill, in the parish of Inveresk, and also of the lands and barony of Wolmet and the Hill, lying within the parish of Newton and sheriffdom of Edinburgh, excepting always the coal lying within the parks, garden, and inclosures of the said lands and barony of Wolmet, unless the consent of the Earl of Wemyss be first had and obtained thereto.' The question was whether Lord Wemyss was entitled to work the coal which he had reserved from this lease? Your Lordships decided that he was not entitled to work the reserved coal. In that case your Lordships carried the doctrine founded upon the bona fides of the contract of location, and which says that the lessor shall do nothing to the prejudice of the lessee, so far as to find that Lord Wemyss was not at liberty to work the coal so excepted from his lease; it being clearly the meaning of the parties, from the very nature of the contract, when they entered into the lease, that the lessee should work the coal let to him; and on the other hand, that the lessor should not set up a rival colliery. The Court, in that case, thought that the obligation on the lessor arose from the circumstances of the case, and the bona fides that takes place in the contract of location; and in that question, one observation that seemed to have much weight was, that it was perfectly clear that the lessee never would have entered into the bargain at all had he conceived it possible that the proprietor of the reserved coal might, whenever he pleased, erect a new colliery, and perhaps undersell the lessee in the market."

The other case relied upon in Campbell v. Watt was that of Graham & Black v. Stevenson, in 1792, reported by Baron Hume (Decisions, p. 781). In that case it appeared that Graham of Netherby let to a tenant an inn at Longtown in the county of Cumberland in England. The tenant occupied the subjects for nine years. He then received notice to quit from the landlord, —the new tenant's entry being at Whitsunday 1787. The innkeeper tenant being thus informed that he must quit possession at Whitsunday 1787, at once applied for and obtained a lease of an inn at the village of Gretna, in Scotland, with entry at Martinmas 1786. He paid his rent for the English inn down to Whitsunday 1787, and he at Martinmas 1786 removed the whole of his family and servants, with his horses, carriages, furniture, and his whole establishment, to Gretna. He took down the sign-post on the English inn, and shut it up, but kept possession of it till Whitsunday 1787. This was a manifest injury to the English inn, because it prevented the resort of business to it as an inn, and so the landlord, with the concurrence of the new tenant, raised an action of damages against the former tenant for the wrong that had been done to the custom of the English inn. There were allegations of a conspiracy on the part of the tenant who removed and other innkeepers to destroy the custom of the English inn, which the Court held not to be proved; but they found damages to the extent of £25 to the new tenant of the English inn: and the reporter states that, "in giving this judgment the Court did not proceed on the charge of combination, which was not sufficiently established, but on the breach of the bona fides of the lease, by shutting up the house for several months, to the injury of its business and character as an inn." Certainly the doctrine of bona fides was here pushed a very great length indeed, notwithstanding the argument that the removing tenant merely acted in the fair prosecution of his own trade and interest; and that, as he had paid the rent for the English inn up to Whitsunday, the landlord and the new tenant had no right to complain, or to insist upon his continuing to be an English innkeeper.

The advising in the case of Campbell v. Watt is noted in these terms by Baron Hume on his Session papers: "18th June 1795.—J.-Clk. [Braxfield]. Paction extrinsic to the nature of a lease, such as pactions for retention of rent, are not good against singular successor. But this is a natural paction* [sic] to the contract. And I think the bona fides of it was to hinder him from building another inn. If had applied in time, I think they might have stopped it; but at anyrate, abatement due." Baron Hume, when he came to write out his report of the case, expanded this advising somewhat; at all events, this seems to me to have been a sound judgment according to the statement of the facts; and the cases of Wemyss and Graham indicate to what great length the doctrine of implied condition or of good faith in contracts can be carried.

In like manner I am of opinion that the judgment of Lord Craighill in the case of Smith v. Cameron was a sound judgment. It was determined according to its own special circumstances. The landlord lets to his tenant a hotel, at the yearly rent of £310, in the village of Fort-William, "which," says Lord Craighill, "if not a high, was a full rent for the premises." There was no other hotel at the time when the lease was taken in this village. Its season was six weeks in the year; and unless the innkeeper got the whole traffic, it was perfectly manifest, upon the proof led in the case, that he could never pay the stipulated rent. Was the landlord, then, after the lease was concluded, entitled to do as he did—buy the parish schoolhouse (at a distance of 200 yards from the hotel which he had let), and convert it into another hotel, to compete with the tenant who was to pay him the £310 a-year? This seems to be a case where it would be the grossest injustice to refuse to the tenant who was injured by the new rival the redress which he asked; and looking to the amount of damages there given, it must have been considered a sound judgment by those acting for the defender, seeing that it was acquiesced in.

But then, when I come to consider the facts of the present case, I find them totally different. There are no specialties in the lease pointing to restriction upon the landlord's exercise of the right of property on other parts of his houses in Glasgow, as was the case in Campbell v. Watt; and there is no peculiarity in regard to the locality of the subject let, such as a Highland village, with a very restricted set of customers, and that, too, during a very small part of the year, as in the case of Smith v. Cameron. The property let to the pursuer is in a central part of the populous city of Glasgow, where there are other rival establishments, according to the proof, all around. There can be no implication here to the effect that the landlord who possesses property in the neighbouring streets in Glasgow, or in other parts of Glasgow, should be prevented from letting them for the same purpose. It would be wholly unreasonable to establish a rule that would sanction such a conclusion with reference to such a case on the one hand, as it would be, on the other, to refuse to enforce the doctrine of fairplay or implied condition, in reference to subjects situated in a locality of a different character, like Fort-William. Further, it cannot be overlooked that in some towns there are whole streets in which one finds only booksellers, and watchmakers, and other tradesmen all dealing in the same articles. If in these streets a person possessed two houses, it would be very hard if, after having let one to a bookseller or a watchmaker, he could not be allowed to let the other to the same kind of tradesman, if, as was very probable, he could get no other kind of tenant to take his shop in such a street.

I am constrained, therefore, to come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be altered, not because I disagree with him as to the legal views that ought to govern such cases as this, but because he has not given full effect to the special circumstances of the locality of the property let.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, now under review, ought to be recalled, and the defender assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

I accept as correct the first four findings in fact by the Lord Ordinary, and I demur to the fifth finding only in so far as the word "injury" there used may be held to imply that a wrong was done to the pursuer. I take it as established that the pursuer suffered loss and damage to the extent and from the cause stated by the Lord Ordinary; but, in my opinion, such loss was damnum sine injuria. The real question in this case is that decided by the Lord Ordinary in his sixth finding, which is in these terms:—"That the defender's said arrangements were contrary to the good faith of the contract of lease between him and the pursuer, and in breach of the implied obligations incident to that contract." From that finding I entirely dissent.

For the sake of clearness, I recapitulate shortly the facts of the case bearing upon this sixth finding. In 1883 the defender let to the pursuer a tenement in Graeme Street, Glasgow, then (and for some time previously) occupied as a common lodging-house, for a period of seven years, at a rent of £400 per annum. The pursuer intended to occupy, and after entering upon possession did occupy, the premises as a common lodging-house, in the knowledge of the defender. In 1886 the defender converted certain premises (of which he had become proprietor), previously used as a warehouse, into a common lodging-house of practically the same kind as that possessed by the pursuer, and has since 1886, either by himself or another tenant (I think it immaterial which), continued to use and occupy it as such. The premises let to the pursuer are separated from those occupied by the defender by a street situated behind the pursuer's premises, the defender's premises alone having a frontage to and entering from that street. Both premises are situated in a densely populated part of Glasgow. The pursuer says these are rival establishments, and I take that to be so, in the sense that they are both common lodging-houses, offering the same kind of accommodation to the same class of people. In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary holds that the defender has acted "contrary to the good faith of the contract of lease between him and the pursuer, and in breach of the implied obligation incident to said contract," and has found the defender liable to the pursuer, not only for the damage which has already resulted from the alleged breach of faith or contract, but also for damage which it is anticipated the pursuer will suffer therefrom during the three years of his lease which have yet to run.

The grounds on which the judgment under review proceeds are that the defender has acted (1) contrary to the good faith of his contract with the pursuer, and (2) in breach of an implied condition of that contract.

If these are intended to be taken as separate and distinct grounds of judgment, I dissent from the first for the reason that a breach of good faith would not of itself afford either a relevant ground of action nor a valid ground of judgment. But I understand the Lord Ordinary's view to be that the defender acted contrary to the good faith of his contract in such a manner as to amount to a breach of an implied condition of that contract. And that implied condition is, that having let the premises in question to the pursuer, to be used and occupied as a common lodging-house, the defender undertook, or was bound, not to let to any other tenant, or to occupy himself, any other property of which he was proprietor as a common lodging-house during the currency of the pursuer's lease. I am of opinion that such a condition is not implied in the contract of lease.

I think it is difficult to find room in the present case for the notion that the parties left any part of their contract to be implied. They entered into a formal lease, which appears to include all the clauses and conditions to be found usually in such a deed. It even expresses conditions which, if not expressed, would have been implied. In these circumstances the ordinary rules of law would exclude the addition to the contract of any condition or obligation not there expressed. The deliberate and formal contract would alone be looked to as containing the extent and limit of the rights and obligations of the parties hinc inde. But the difficulty thus suggested becomes even more formidable for the pursuer, when regard is had to the character of the obligation which he seeks now to have added to the contract as an implied condition. For it amounts to a positive restriction on the use to which the defender may put any other property belonging to him in Glasgow. The pursuer tries to get over the difficulty presented by an "implied condition" of so wide and sweeping a range, by putting it in this limited form—that a landlord is not entitled "to set up for his own behoof, side by side with the premises so let, a rival establishment in the same line of business." I have already said that, in my opinion, it is immaterial whether the landlord sets up the rival establishment for his own behoof directly, or sets it up for his own behoof indirectly, by letting his premises to another for the purpose "of a rival establishment in the same line of business." But is the implied condition, which is supposed to be implied by the law as a condition of every lease, limited to the case of setting up rival establishments "side by side"? What authority is there for thus limiting the application of the implied condition? Not Campbell v. Watt, for there the rival establishments were some distance apart. Does the implied condition not limit or exclude the setting up of such an establishment in the next street, or fifty yards off? If not (as the defender asks), why not? The pursuer says that this is a "legal puzzle,"—a mere echo "of the unsuccessful argument in Campbell v. Watt," but makes no effort to solve the puzzle. It is easier sometimes to make light of an argument than to answer it. The defender's question is, nevertheless, a very pertinent one, dealing as he is with an alleged obligation which is said to form, by force of law, an implied condition in every contract of lease. He is entitled to know the extent of that obligation which the law imposes upon him without paction; and it is no answer to his question to say that the law will imply an obligation of a certain limited kind in this particular case. If the condition for which the pursuer contends is to be implied at all, I see no ground whatever on which it may be limited to establishments "side by side." It must go the length at least of prohibiting a landlord from letting or occupying his property for a business which may, within reasonable probability, come into competition or rivalry with the business carried on in premises he had previously let. If this, then, is the nature of the implied condition claimed by the pursuer, I think it clear that it is not one of the conditions which the law implies in the contract of lease. The conditions which the law implies as involved in any contract are conditions which the general character of the contract at once suggests. They are the natural, if not the essential, attributes of the contract; they are qualities of the contract in the abstract, for the law implies no conditions in any concrete bargain. Thus, in the contract of lease, the law implies an obligation on the lessor to give the lessee possession of the subjects let at the agreed-on term of entry, and to give the subjects and maintain them in a habitable condition. Without these conditions, undertaken or enforceable, there would be no contract of lease—no relation of landlord and tenant between the parties. There must be possession, and habitable possession. But what is there in the contract of lease, in the abstract, to suggest that the landlord who has given his tenant the subject he has let to him in a habitable condition, and fulfilled all his pactional engagements to that tenant, is farther to be restricted in the lawful use and enjoyment, or the most beneficial use, of his other property, simply because that other property happens to be within a certain distance of the premises he had previously let? In my opinion, such a restriction on the use of property is not to be presumed or implied: restrictions on the use of property can only be imposed by law or paction. There is certainly no paction by which the alleged restriction on the pursuer's use of his property has been imposed. Nor is there any general rule of law which prevents a proprietor letting two different properties to different tenants for the same kind of business or occupation in the same town or the same street.

The pursuer, however, urges that the question raised in the present case has been already decided favourably to his claim in the case of Campbell v. Watt, 18th June 1795 (Hume, 788), and Smith v. Cameron, decided by Lord Craighill on 25th March 1879. The latter case has not been reported, but a copy of Lord Craighill's judgment has been laid before the Court, from which it appears that, both as regards the facts and the grounds of judgment, that case is not distinguishable from the present. Lord Craighill's judgment was not taken to review, and the decision in Smith v. Cameron therefore stands upon the opinion of a single Judge. For the reasons already given, I dissent from that judgment.

The case of Campbell v. Watt, however, stands in a different position; for it appears from the report to have been decided by the whole Court. If that case had not been distinguishable from the present, I should have been humbly of opinion that the judgment there pronounced was erroneous. But I think a careful consideration of the report of Campbell v. Watt shews that it is distinguishable from the present case in material respects.

The facts in Campbell v. Watt were simply these: In 1789 the landlord let to the tenant, on a tack for nineteen years, "the farm of Hayfield, the inn, stables, and lands of Crosshill, and fifteen acres of the lands of Classock." The inn "was the established half-way house and regular stage on the road between Glasgow and Greenock." The tenant was taken bound to eject the then tenant of a smithy at Crosshill, and the landlord engaged in return "that in any set of a smithy to be erected by him he shall take the tenant bound not to sell liquor of any kind to the prejudice of Mrs Watt." In 1793 the line of road from Glasgow to Greenock was altered, under the authority of an Act of Parliament, with the result that "the Crosshill inn lost the whole business of the great road from Glasgow to Greenock." The landlord erected a new inn at a point where the new road joined the road from Paisley, and at a distance (as I understand the report) of about a mile from the Crosshill inn. The tenant did not apply for any interdict to stop the building of the new inn, but after it was finished she insisted on getting "an abatement of rent to the extent of £70 a-year, corresponding, as she said, to the damage by her loss as innkeeper at Crosshill." This abatement was refused; and the landlord having given a charge for his rent, the tenant brought a suspension of the charge, in which she also prayed "for an interdict against the use of the new house as an inn during the currency of her tack." The interdict was refused by the Lord Ordinary, "after advising with the Court," but the bill was passed to try the question of abatement of rent. In support of the claim for an abatement of rent the tenant argued (1) That the inn was the principal subject of the tack, and "it is against the bona fides of that contract for the landlord to take away or lessen its business by erecting a rival inn, especially one so near it"; and (2) That a tenant owed no rent where the subject proves utterly sterile, though owing to accident only, but here the subject became sterile through the act of the landlord. It is not necessary to notice the answers made by the landlord, but the decision of the case is thus reported,—"The Lords were of opinion that Mrs Watt had a good claim of abatement of rent. Observed on the bench—. . . The restraint here in question is a natural incident of a tack of such a subject; and whether conditioned or not, it was in the bona fides of the transaction that the landlord should not set up a rival inn to the prejudice of his own tenant in the old one. If Mrs Watt had applied timefully, she might perhaps have obtained an interdict against the new building; but in any event she is entitled to an abatement of rent."

The only thing to be gathered from the report of this case favourable to the contention of the present pursuer is contained in what is said to have been "observed on the bench," and assuming for the moment that these observations were either necessary to the decision of the case, or were expressive of the grounds of judgment, a reason may be found for them which the present case does not present. The landlord in Campbell v. Watt had expressly bound himself not to let the smithy on Crosshill to any tenant without taking him bound "not to sell liquor of any kind to the prejudice of Mrs Watt." From this express obligation to keep Mrs Watt free from rivalry in the premises in which (presumably) at that time her only rival carried on his competing business, it might reasonably be inferred that the landlord undertook not to permit such rivalry elsewhere, so far as his own acts were concerned. It would not have been reasonable for the landlord, who had given such an express undertaking, to set up a public-house next door to the inn, and defend himself on the ground that it was not "a set of a smithy." This express undertaking (which has no parallel in the present case) might very well be taken into account in judging of what was the real contract between the landlord and tenant.

But whether this was so or not, I think there are other and more material grounds for distinguishing between this case and Campbell v. Watt. It is not possible to say who made the observations "from the bench," or how many of the Judges concurred in them. But the judgment of the Court was that the tenant had a good claim for "abatement of rent." Now, "abatement of rent" is not a lawyer's mode of expressing "damages on account of a wrong." I take it, therefore, that the Court was dealing with a question of abatement of rent, and not damages. A sufficient ground for the judgment pronounced was found in the admitted sterility of the subject let, and that sterility is attributed in the report of the case (apart from the argument for Mrs Watt) to the change which took place in the public road, and not in the erection of the new inn. No such claim is made by the present pursuer, and the loss which I assume he has established would probably be insufficient to support such a claim, if made. His subject is, on his own shewing, far from being sterile, although it may not yield so much one year as another.

The view that the Court were only deciding a claim of abatement of rent on the ground that the subject let had become sterile is strengthened, in my opinion, by the fact that the interdict craved by Mrs Watt against the continued use of the new inn was refused by the Lord Ordinary, after consultation with the Court. If the landlord was in breach of his contract with the tenant in erecting and carrying on the new inn, he was doing the tenant a wrong—and a continuing wrong. The proper remedy against that is interdict, but interdict was refused. That refusal could not be on account of the abatement of rent awarded (it is not said to what extent that claim was sustained), because such award only represented the injury already sustained, and was therefore no remedy against the continuing wrong. All that was "observed on the bench" in reference to the interdict was that if Mrs Watt "had applied timefully, she might perhaps have obtained an interdict against the new building"—that is, I suppose, against the erection of the new building. But Mrs Watt was quite in time to apply for an interdict against the new inn, so long as her lease was current, if the new inn was a breach of her contract, and therefore a wrong against her. The absence of all reference in the judgment to this undoubted right to interdict a continuing wrong seems, as I have said, to point to the conclusion that the Court was dealing with, or at all events deciding, the question merely of an abatement of rent claimed on the ground of sterility of the subject let, and not a question of damages on account of a wrong. I am therefore of opinion that the decision in the case of Campbell v. Watt affords no authority in support of the pursuer's present claim.

I would not have assented to the Lord Ordinary's mode of assessing damages in this case, even if I had been of opinion that damages were due. The damage for one year is assessed at £250, and the Lord Ordinary gives the same rate for three years yet to come. How does it appear that any damage will be suffered by the pursuer next year? Notwithstanding the defender's rival establishment, the pursuer's house may not suffer; he may have as many lodgers as he can accommodate. The damage given for future years is a mere speculation, and may turn out to be an erroneous speculation. But damages should not be awarded unless sustained, the pursuer having always his remedy as the damage arises.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the majority of the consulted Judges.

The premises let to the pursuer by the defender on a lease for seven years had been previously used as a lodging-house by a person of the name of Graham, and was known to the public as "Graham's Lodging House."

There is no question of goodwill in the case, for the pursuer did not acquire or pay for anything in the nature of goodwill either to the landlord or to Graham. He took, however, whatever advantage there might be in the name of the house, by retaining and using the name of "Graham's Lodging House."

The defender was at the date of the lease the owner of another adjacent block of building then occupied as a warehouse, but which was well adapted for occupation as a lodging-house, being, like the premises let to the pursuer, situated in the very centre of the most populous part of the city of Glasgow. These adjacent premises accordingly the defender made arrangements for occupying as a lodging-house in the year 1886, and they have been so occupied ever since.

There is no express condition in the pursuer's lease that the defender shall be restrained or shall abstain during the pursuer's lease from so occupying the adjacent premises; nor is there any expression, so far as I can see, in the pursuer's lease, from which by the remotest inference such a restraint can be shewn to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties.

But such a condition is said to be implied from the purpose for which the premises were let, and from the whole circumstances surrounding the transaction. The Court allowed the pursuer before answer a proof of the alleged circumstances, and in this perhaps we were too indulgent. For I am rather disposed to think that instead of allowing such proof we ought to have dismissed the action as irrelevant. However that may be, the result of the proof is certainly not favourable to the pursuer's contention.

In the course of the argument the defender very properly challenged the pursuer to formulate the condition which he contends is implied in the lease; for a condition which is implied in a contract must be susceptible of clear and accurate expression. But this challenge has never been met. The Court are thus left to conjecture what is the nature and what are the limits of the restraint on the landlord which is said to be implied, whether the restraint is limited to the block of houses adjacent to the subject of the lease, or extends to other property of the landlord in the same street, or in the same parish, or in the same town, and whether if the defender sells the buildings belonging to him, immediately adjacent or elsewhere, he is under obligation to take the purchaser bound not to occupy the subjects sold as a lodging-house during the currency of the pursuer's lease.

Such an implied condition is in my opinion inconsistent with the free exercise of proprietary rights, would be altogether intolerable in practice, and has no foundation in legal principle.

LORD MURE.—I also concur in the opinion of the majority of the consulted Judges. The only material difficulty which occurred to me in considering the case was in connection with the decision in Campbell v. Watt, reported by Baron Hume, and recognised by institutional writers, since his reports were published, as supporting the doctrine contended for by the pursuer. The bench which decided that case was a very strong one—Sir Ilay Campbell was Lord President, Lord Braxfield was Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lord Eskgrove was the Lord Ordinary. The decision, moreover, was a unanimous one, and appears to lay down the principle of implied obligation, alleged to have been there given effect to, as applicable to all leases of any similar subject. The course, therefore, which your Lordship took of sending the present case to the whole Court was, I think, a very desirable one; and was the more necessary because Professor Bell in his Principles, sec. 1273, gives the case of Campbell v. Watt as an authority for the doctrine that "the landlord of an inn is not to set up a rival inn without abating rent"; and I observe that Mr Hunter also takes that view in his work upon Landlord and Tenant (ii. 460).

In these circumstances, we have now the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges that such an implied condition cannot be read into the lease here in question, and that if such a condition is to be maintained there must be an express stipulation to that effect, as there was in the case of Davie to which we were referred at the discussion; and, apart from the decision in the case of Campbell, I should have had no great difficulty in coming to the same conclusion. Because it appears to me that if parties mean to insist upon a provision of that kind, it should be specially stipulated for in the lease, and there will then be no difficulty in giving effect to it as was done in the case of Davie. The main question, therefore, which we have here to consider is whether the decision in the case of Campbell v. Watt must be taken to be an authority for the broad proposition contended for by the pursuer. I am of opinion that it ought not to be so dealt with, and that upon a ground indicated in the opinions both of Lord Fraser and Lord Trayner, and rested on a clause in the lease in that case by which the landlord undertook "that in any set of a smithy to be erected by him he shall take the tenant bound not to sell liquor of any kind to the prejudice of Mrs Watt." There was thus an express undertaking on the part of Campbell, the landlord, that he would not allow liquor of any kind to be sold at the smithy to the prejudice of the tenant, Mrs Watt; and from this, I think, the Court might very properly infer that there was in that lease an implied obligation on the landlord not to erect any other building which should interfere with the sale of drink or refreshments by Mrs Watt in her inn. But the decision cannot, in my opinion, be held to go further, and there are no provisions in the lease here in question on which any such implied obligation can be rested. This, as it appears to me, is an explanation of the judgment in Watt's case which is sufficient to obviate the difficulty which has been felt by Lord Craighill in the case of Cameron, and by Lord Lee in this case; and I agree generally in the view which has been taken by your Lordship in your opinion in the present case.

LORD SHAND.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be recalled, and the defender assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

There is confessedly no express obligation on the part of the landlord to refrain from opening a lodging-house in Glasgow, either in the same neighbourhood or at a distance from the premises which are the subject of the lease. And I can see no ground for holding that the mere granting of a lease, even if the purpose for which the premises are let be expressly stated, implies a restraint on the lessor against letting other premises for the same or a similar purpose, or against the lessor using any property of his own for carrying on the same business as that for which the first lease was granted. If a tenant desires, as a condition of entering into his lease, to have his landlord restrained from engaging in a similar business, or from using or letting other premises for the purposes of a similar business to that in which he is about to engage, he must in my opinion do so by obtaining an express obligation which shall define the nature and extent of the restraint to which the lessor consents, or, at the least, the lease must contain such very special stipulations as infer by necessary implication a restraint on the future action of the lessor, of a nature and extent which admits of no doubt. In the present case there is nothing in the lease which even suggests any such implied obligation.

Accordingly I am of opinion that the pursuer's case fails on the proof, as I think it also does on the relevancy of the statements on record.

In the case of Smith v. Cameron, decided by Lord Craighill, his Lordship's interlocutor allowing a proof was brought under review of the First Division of the Court on 30th November 1878, when a full argument on the relevancy of the pursuer's averments took place. The question there raised was whether the defender, who had let certain premises as an hotel, had come under an implied obligation not to let other property to which he had right, or might acquire right, also for an hotel. I was strongly of opinion that there was no such obligation implied in or from the lease, and consequently no relevant case, and I expressed myself to that effect, and of the opinion that the interlocutor should be recalled, and the defender assoilzied. The majority of my brethren were however of opinion that it was desirable without expressing an opinion on the question of implied contract at that stage, to allow the proof which was "before answer" to go on, and this was the judgment of the Court. I am, of course, now of opinion that the case of Smith v. Cameron was not well decided, and that the pursuer was not entitled to succeed in obtaining damages as he did by the judgment of Lord Craighill which was allowed to become final. In the present case the interlocutor allowing a proof before answer was also brought under review; but although I thought the pursuer's case bad in law, because the lease raised no such implied obligation as the pursuer maintained, the case of Smith v. Cameron was a direct authority on the question of procedure, and, therefore, I acquiesced in the affirmance of the order for proof.

As to the case of Campbell v. Watt, I concur in the observations contained in the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner, and think there is nothing decided in that case which can support the argument for the pursuer in the present case.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . In terms of the opinion of the majority of the whole Judges, recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Assoilzie the defender, Gavin Bell Millar, from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the said defender entitled to expenses," &c.

Trust—Investment—Liability of trustees and of law-agent—Title to sue—Beneficiary with contingent interest.—A marriage-contract empowered the trustees acting under it (two of whom were the spouses) to lend on, inter alia, heritable securities, or personal securities or obligations, and declared that the trustees should not be answerable "for errors, omissions, or neglect of diligence, nor for the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases." The greater part of the trust-funds were lent by the trustees on the security of buildings in the course of erection, the rents of which, after their completion, turned out to be wholly insufficient to meet the interest on the loan, and the borrower became bankrupt. While both spouses were alive the children of the marriage, whose interest under the contract was during the marriage contingent merely, brought an action against the trustees and the law-agent to the trust, "conjunctly and severally, or severally, or in such other way or manner as should seem just," to have them ordained to restore the money to the trust. The law-agent and one of the trustees lodged defences.

It appeared from a proof that the buildings, which were in Glasgow, were of the nature of a speculation in the particular locality, and that the speculation wholly failed. The proposed loan was (along with others) placed before the trustees at a meeting where the spouses were present, and with it a valuation by an architect which had been obtained by the borrower. This valuation shewed an ample margin on the estimated value of the buildings when completed. The trustees obtained no separate valuation, nor did their law-agent suggest the propriety of obtaining one. The loan was agreed to at the meetings at which it was placed before the trustees.

The Court—while unanimously of opinion that the security was one which ought not to have been accepted by trustees—(diss. Lord Mure, Lord Shand, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark) assoilzied the trustee, and (diss. Lord Young) assoilzied the law-agent on the following grounds.

The Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lord Adam held that gratuitous trustees are only liable for such diligence, prudence, and knowledge as they actually possess in the management of their own business, and that, judged by this standard, the evidence shewed there had been no negligence on the part of the trustee.

Lord Young held that the trustee was not liable, as he had acted on what he considered the best advice, that of the law-agent.

Lord Mure, Lord Shand, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark were of opinion that gratuitous trustees must shew the same reasonable care that a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own business, and that the trustee was liable, as the evidence shewed he had failed in this.

Opinion per the Lord President that the indemnity clause in the marriage-contract protected the trustee—Opinions contra per Lords Mure, Shand, and Young.

The Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Shand, Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and Lord Adam, held that the pursuers had no title to sue the law-agent, (1) because he was not employed by them, and (2) because they might never become entitled to the trust-estate, and would in that event suffer no damage.

Lords Mure and Shand were of opinion that there was no liability, even assuming a title to sue, because a law-agent is not responsible for the sufficiency of a security, unless there is a special undertaking to that effect, which was not alleged in the present case.

Lord Young was of opinion that as all the parties were before the Court the liability of the law-agent should be determined in the present action, and, on the evidence, that there had been a failure of duty on his part, and that he was liable.

(See Rae v. Meek, June 29, 1886, 13 R. 1036.)

The Rev. Robert Reid Rae, minister of Avondale, was married to Miss Jessie Croil in 1852. By antenuptial contract Mr Rae settled his furniture on his wife, and bound himself to pay the rates to the Ministers' Widows Fund punctually, while she, on her part, conveyed property to the value of £5000 to trustees—"(First) for behoof of the said Jessie Croil herself in liferent during the subsistence of the said marriage, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and powers of administration as aforesaid, and in order that she may by herself, without her husband's concurrence, receive, discharge, use, and dispose of the whole rents, interest, and profits of the said means and estate; and in case of the dissolution of the said marriage by the decease of the said Rev. Robert Reid Rae, for behoof of the said Jessie Croil, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee; (Secondly) In case of the dissolution of the said marriage by the decease of the said Jessie Croil, for behoof of the said Rev. Robert Reid Rae in liferent from and after her decease, so long as he shall survive her, and remain unmarried, and in order that he may, during the said period, receive, discharge, and enjoy the said rents, interest, and profits; and (Lastly) in case of the dissolution of the said marriage by the event last mentioned, and of there being a child or children thereof surviving at the decease or second marriage of the said Rev. Robert Reid Rae, and attaining twenty-one years of age, or (if a daughter or daughters) being married, for behoof of such child or children so surviving, and attaining majority, or (if female) being married, in fee." A power of sale was conferred on the trustees—"They being bound always to invest or reinvest the proceeds of such sales, and all other principal sums to be realised by them, either in the purchase of heritable property, feu-duties, or ground-annuals, or Government or bank stocks, or heritable securities, or even upon such personal securities or obligations as they may approve of as good and sufficient, taking the titles, securities, and obligations always in favour of themselves as trustees for the purposes of these presents." The marriage-contract further declared "that the said trustees shall not be answerable for errors, omissions, or neglect of diligence, nor for the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases, nor singuli in solidum, or for the intromissions of each other or of their factor, but each for his or her actual intromissions only, under deduction of all payments bona fide made in fulfilment of the premises."

The trustees who accepted were Mr and Mrs Rae, the latter being a sine qua non, Mr Meek of Fortisat, formerly a West India merchant, and the Rev. John Ellis Rae, a brother of Mr Rae.

In January 1874, it became necessary to reinvest £4750 of the £5000 conveyed by Mrs Rae to the marriage-contract trustees, and accordingly on 30th January a meeting of the trustees was held at which all the trustees above named were present together with Mr Hotson of Hotson & Howie, writers, the agents to the trust. The minute of that meeting bore (after setting forth how the £4750 came to require reinvestment),—"It being necessary to reinvest the two sums thus to be received at Whitsunday, it was resolved to look for heritable securities of adequate value, and Mr Hotson was directed to be on the outlook for such, and to report to the trustees any proposals he might receive."

On 5th May 1874 another meeting was held, at which were present Mr and Mrs Rae, Mr Meek and Mr Hotson. The minute bore,—"There were laid before the meeting rentals and valuations of several heritable properties on which loans were wanted, after considering and comparing which, the trustees resolved to make a loan of four thousand five hundred pounds (£4500) to Mr William Anderson, one of the applicants, on the security of buildings in Gallowgate, valued by Mr Burnet, architect, at £6500; provided always that Mr Hotson shall be satisfied with the title, and that such part of the loan shall be deposited in bank, in the joint names of the parties' law-agents, as Mr Burnet shall judge to be sufficient for furnishing the buildings, to be drawn out and paid over to Mr Anderson when Mr Burnet shall, at his expense, report the full completion of the work."

The valuation referred to was a valuation by Mr John Burnet, architect, Glasgow, and had been obtained by Anderson, the applicant for the loan. It was in these terms:—"150 St Vincent Street, Glasgow, 30th April 1874.—Messrs Brownlie & Watson, writers, &c., &c.,—Sirs,—Having carefully examined that property to the eastward of the property at the corner of Gallowgate Street, and the lane leading to Spoutmouth Street, both belonging to Mr William Anderson, I find that it consists of a plot of ground, containing 361 square yards or thereby, having a frontage of 41 feet 9 inches to Gallowgate Street, and is covered with buildings to be occupied as a shop and warehouses. I am of opinion that, when the buildings are finished, papered and painted, ready for occupation, this property will be worth six thousand five hundred pounds stg., say £6500, over and above the annual feu-duty of £191, 19s. 1d.,—I am, Sirs, your obedient servant, JOHN BURNET."

The subject of the proposed security was part of a large block of buildings in the Gallowgate, Glasgow. The buildings were being erected at an outlay of nearly £30,000 on ground obtained from the City Improvement Trustees, and consisted of shops below and warehouses and workshops above. Buildings of such a character had never been erected in that part of Glasgow before. The ground-annual, as stated in Mr Burnet's valuation, was £191, 19s. 1d.

The loan was accepted, and a bond and disposition in security for £4500, at 4½ per cent, in favour of the trustees, was granted on 20th May 1874. The money was not all advanced at once, £2800 being retained to await the completion of the buildings. This sum was advanced by instalments on the report of Mr Burnet. The last instalment was paid on 18th October 1875, by which time the buildings had been completed.

Interest at the stipulated rate was paid on the loan till Whitsunday 1878. In January 1879 Anderson, the debtor, was sequestrated. No interest was paid thereafter. The buildings had never been sufficiently let to pay the ground-annual of £191, 19s. 1d., and were for the most part unlet.

In February 1886 Jane Donaldson Reid Rae and Agnes Lloyd Reid Rae, the two surviving children of the marriage of Mr and Mrs Rae, raised an action against their parents, the Rev. J. E. Rae, and Mr Meek, as trustees under the marriage-contract, and also against Hotson & Howie, the law-agents, concluding for declarator "that the defenders are, conjunctly and severally, or severally, or in such other way or manner as to our said Lords shall seem just, bound to make payment to the said John Meek, John Ellis Rae, Robert Reid Rae, and Jessie Croil or Rae, as trustees foresaid, of the sum of £4500 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 sterling per centum per annum from the date of signeting hereof until payment, or from such other date as to our said Lords shall seem just until payment, the said sum and interest to be applied by the said John Meek, John Ellis Rae, Robert Reid Rae, and Jessie Croil or Rae, as trustees foresaid, in conformity with the purposes of the trust constituted by the said contract of marriage; and the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, conjunctly and severally, or severally, or in such other way or manner as to our said Lords shall seem just, to make payment to the said John Meek, John Ellis Rae, Robert Reid Rae, and Jessie Croil or Rae, as trustees foresaid, of the said sum of £4500 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 sterling per centum per annum from the date of signeting hereof until payment, or from such other date as to our said Lords shall seem just, until payment."

The pursuers, after narrating the proceedings down to the acceptance of the loan, and giving a description of the security buildings in substantial accordance with the foregoing narrative (which was borne out by the proof), averred,—(Cond. 7) "The said sum of £4500, and interest thereon, was lost to the trust-estate through the gross negligence and violation of duty of the said trustees who were present at the meeting of the 5th May 1874, and through the gross negligence and want of skill of the said Messrs Hotson & Howie, the agents in the trust. The investment was one which no prudent or reasonable man would ever have made, and there were plenty of good and safe investments to be had for the money. The said Mrs Jessie Croil or Rae and her husband were ignorant of business affairs and of what was a prudent investment, and they relied upon the knowledge and skill and carefulness of Mr Meek and of Messrs Hotson & Howie. It was gross negligence and want of skill on the part of Mr Meek and the latter to allow the trust-funds to be invested on the said subjects, because, inter alia, the buildings which it was proposed should be erected were of a purely speculative character, for which there was no demand in the locality, because their value had not been tested by an actual rental, and the defenders had not even before them at the time of granting the loan any estimated rental, and because the feu-duty annually payable was such that no person of prudence would have lent £4500, or any sum, over the buildings subject thereto. The nature of the locality was well known to Mr Meek and the agents. It was impossible, without the grossest negligence, to make an investment which would immediately thereafter result in almost the whole of the trust-estate being lost. The said Hotson & Howie grossly failed in their professional duty by allowing the trustees to invest in such a speculation. It was through their advice and on their instigation that the investment was made. It was their duty, as the professional advisers of the trustees, to have prevented their investing the trust-funds on unbuilt or unlet property, the investment being of such a nature as is never sanctioned by agents for trustees."

Of the trustees Mr Meek alone lodged defences. His answer to the foregoing averment was,—(Answer 7 for defender John Meek) "Denied. The defender acted in the circumstances with all ordinary care and prudence, relying on the advice of competent professional men. At the time when the said advance was made, the security afforded by the said subjects was ample, and it continued so until the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, as aforesaid, and the consequent depression of trade, and deterioration of all kinds of property in Glasgow, and throughout the country. The loss to the trust-estate is one which the defender could not foresee or prevent, and for which he is not responsible either at common law or under the said antenuptial contract of marriage, which is referred to for its terms, he having acted in bona fide for the benefit of the trust-estate, and to the best of his judgment, in authorising the said loan."

Separate defences were lodged for Hotson & Howie and for Hamilton Andrew Hotson, the representative of the Mr Hotson who had had personal charge of the loan negotiation, raising a question of partnership liability which was ultimately not taken into consideration by the Court. Hamilton Andrew Hotson's answer, which raised the general question, was in these terms,—(Ans. 7 for defender Hamilton Andrew Hotson) "Denied that there was any negligence or want of skill on the part of Hotson & Howie. The security was a perfectly eligible one. Full particulars of it and others were laid before, and explained to, the trustees by the agents. The trustees were capable of forming, and acting on, their own judgment, having the guidance of the report of Mr Burnet, an architect in Glasgow of the highest standing. They did exercise their own judgment in the matter, and selected the investment in question. Quoad ultra denied."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said principal sum of £4500, and interest thereon since the term of Whitsunday 1878, having been lost through violation of duty and gross recklessness and negligence of the trustees present at the meeting of 5th May 1874, and through the gross negligence and want of skill of their said law-agents, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) In the circumstances the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses.

The defender Meek pleaded;—(1) The pursuers have no title to sue. (2) The defender not having been guilty of violation or neglect of duty, as libelled, is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The defender H. A. Hotson pleaded (the pleas for the firm being, on this question, substantially the same);—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' averments are not relevant. In particular, it is not said that the law-agents were employed by the pursuers, but by the trustees, to whom alone they are answerable. (3) The trustees having, on full information and proper advice, selected the investment in question, which was within the powers of the marriage-contract, no liability attaches to the representatives of the law-agents. (4) The security at the time being perfectly sufficient, and forming a safe and suitable investment for the trust-funds, there was no negligence on the part of the law-agents, and their representatives are not liable for any loss that may afterwards have arisen. (5) The loss having arisen through the general depreciation of property from subsequent and unforeseen causes, no liability attaches to the defender.

On 12th June 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) dismissed the action.

On a reclaiming note the Second Division recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and allowed a proof—(June 29, 1886, 13 R. 1036).

The character of the buildings, as established at the proof, sufficiently appears from the foregoing narrative. The defenders led evidence of experts to shew that the loan was of a sort that was considered prudent in the estimation of people at the time; the pursuers led evidence of a similar character to a contrary effect. The borrower obtained another £10,000 on a postponed catholic security over the whole block.

The defenders sought to shew on the evidence that the details on which Mr Burnet based his valuation were before the trustees at their meeting on 5th May 1874, but the evidence on that point was very obscure. The only parole evidence regarding that meeting was that of Mrs Rae and Mr Meek. Mrs Rae deponed,—"I knew the object of the meeting before I went to it, namely, the investment of the money. I had not been told anything about what the money was to be laid out upon, but we intended that it should all be invested. (Q.) What were you told at the meeting about the investment? (A.) That an investment would be found; it was not found, but would be found. Perhaps it was found by the meeting of 5th of May. (Q.) What else were you told? (A.) That it was a first-class investment—a good investment. (Q.) Who told you that? (A.) Mr Hotson and Mr Meek. (Q.) Were you told anything at that meeting about ground-rent or feu-duty on the property? (A.) No. I was told that the investment was on house property in the Gallowgate of Glasgow. I knew the Gallowgate very little at that time. (Q.) Do you remember your husband saying anything about how the money should be invested? (A.) He said he wished it in a chartered bank. (Q.) Were you told that there was nearly £200 of a ground-annual on the place? (A.) No. I never heard there was any at all. (Q.) Who did you rely on? (A.) Mr Meek. (Q.) Anyone else? (A.) No, he took the management. (Q.) Did you rely on Mr Hotson? (A.) No, I did not think of him. (Q.) Was there any written proposal laid before that meeting about that loan? (A.) Not that I know of. (Q.) Were you told if the buildings on which the money was to be lent were finished or unfinished? (A.) No. (Q.) Was it your belief that they were occupied as dwelling-houses? (A.) That they were there, that they were in existence. (Q.) Did you pay very much attention to the matter? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Had you anything to do with lending money before that? (A.) No. (Q.) Did Mr Meek and Mr Hotson say the investment was a good one more than once? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And you believed them? (A.) Yes."

Mr Meek, who was examined for himself, deponed,—"(Q.) Do you remember discussing Mr Anderson's loan? (A.) I remember that, with respect to the Gallowgate. I was not much pleased with it; but great improvements had been made by the Improvement Trust, and it was becoming a very valuable part of the city. When Mr Anderson's application was laid before us, I pointedly put the question to Mr Hotson whether we were doing right in lending upon a property that was in the course of being built. He answered that there could be no objection on that score—that it was a matter of common, almost daily, occurrence in Glasgow."

The Court after a hearing appointed the cause to be heard before seven Judges.

Argued for the pursuers;—This was a case of the investment of trust-money on a security which had proved to be insufficient or rather worthless—and which those making the investment knew, or ought to have known, to be insufficient. In the first place, the security buildings at the date of the loan were unfinished. They were being erected in a locality in which buildings of the class were an entire novelty. The investment, therefore, was a speculation, and, as it had turned out, an entirely unsuccessful speculation; but whether successful or not, a speculation was not a proper investment for trust-funds. Then no independent valuation was got, the trustees relied only on a valuation obtained by the borrower, and a valuation of such buildings could in the nature of the case be nothing but the merest guess-work—there were no rentals to go upon nor even the rentals of neighbouring buildings of a similar class, there being no such buildings. The valuation too, such as it was, gave no details to the consideration of which the trustees might apply their minds (as it was their duty to do), it was merely a general opinion. There was further a very large ground-annual, and the cost of the buildings was less than the sum lent on them. For the loss thus incurred both sets of defenders were liable, and liable, in this action, to the pursuers.

The trustees were liable. Their liability was established both by the Scots and English authorities. The Scots authorities [1] established these three propositions (a) that trustees, who advanced trust-funds on a borrower's valuation alone, were liable, should loss occur through the insufficiency of the security; (b) that an indemnity clause, such as that here, would not save them from the consequences of their own negligence; and (c) that buildings in course of erection were not a security on which to lend trust-funds. The English authorities were to the same effect.[2] In Speight v. Gaunt,[3] the trustees were released because they bought through a stockbroker. These authorities also established that trustees could not free themselves merely by consulting a law-agent. They were bound to act as prudent men would in the management of their own affairs,[4] and no doubt therefore they ought to take the advice of law-agents, but that did not relieve them from the necessity of applying their own minds to the management of the trust affairs. Nor was it a good defence to Mr Meek that he thought the children's interest was safe in their parents' hands; he was a trustee, and had duties as such. It might be that he had a remedy by way of relief against the agents; and if he had, the pursuers avoided circuity of action by suing the law-agents also. That was the next point.

The law-agent was employed by the trustees not for their own protection, but for the protection of the trust-estate, and at its expense; he was therefore liable to the beneficiaries of the trust. By laying the investment before the trustees, the agents guaranteed that it was a good one—one which trustees might take, and sound in itself. Mr Meek deponed that the agent had stated at the second meeting of the trustees that the investment was quite a usual one. Agents had frequently been found liable.[1] There was no objection to suing the law-agent in the same action as the trustees.[2] An application to the Court to have a judicial factor appointed might no doubt have been made, or to have the trustees ordained to raise an action in their own name against the agent, but all the parties interested were before the Court, and thus circuity of action was avoided. The pursuers might not perhaps be entitled to decree against both sets of defenders, but they were not put to their election between them. They were entitled to have the trust-funds restored; it did not matter to them by whom. Though their interest in the trust was merely contingent, they had that right.

Argued for Meek;—The pursuers had no vested interest in the trust. The action was therefore premature, for it was not certain that they would sustain any loss. They had no title to sue. The liability of trustees in regard to investments was always a question of circumstances, though the general canon might be admitted that the measure of their responsibility was that they should act in regard to trust-investments as a man of ordinary prudence would act in the management of his own investments. But here it must be noticed that the trustees had very ample powers of investment. If the object of the spouses, who were themselves to have the main interest in the estate, had been to secure to the trustees all the powers of investment which they as individuals might have had, they could hardly have used more appropriate language; and then there was the clause of indemnification. The proposed investment was laid before the trustees by the family law-agent as a suitable investment; it was accompanied by a valuation by Mr Burnet, a competent man, and it was accepted by Mr and Mrs Rae, the persons primarily interested in its sufficiency, and both of them able to judge for themselves. In such circumstances, did Mr Meek do anything that a man of reasonable prudence would not have done in agreeing to what they thought best for their own interest? It was an easy matter to judge by after events, but there was nothing to shew that at the time of the investment it was one which no prudent man would have made. The trustees were told that there was a demand for such premises, and that the investment was one of daily occurrence. No doubt the premises were not completed and not wholly let, but there was no absolute rule prohibiting trust-money being invested on such premises—if there was, that was law, in regard to which Mr Meek certainly was entitled to rely on the law-agents. To say that such an investment was illegal because it was a speculation was to beg the question. All investments involved more or less risk, and therefore more or less speculation. The question was one of degree. Here there was no reason at the time of the investment to suppose that the premises would remain unlet. The property was roofed, and partially let, and, though not completed at the time of the loan, it was completed before the last payment was made. The investment therefore was an ordinary one on house property in Glasgow, and reasonably safe, according to the views prevailing at the time.

Argued for the law-agents;—The present defenders were not liable at all; in any case, they were not liable to beneficiaries; even if they were liable to beneficiaries, they were not liable to the pursuers, whose interest as beneficiaries was a contingent interest merely, in an action of damages, as this in substance was; even if thus liable, these defenders were not liable conjunctly and severally with the trustees.

The charge here was a charge of professional negligence. It was not a case in which a law-agent was charged with aiding and abetting trustees in a breach of trust, where he was held as a constructive trustee, and liable jointly and severally along with them.[1] The ground of complaint against the law-agents here was that they had allowed trustees to make an improvident investment. A law-agent might, and frequently did, give advice as to the soundness of an investment, but that did not make him liable as having guaranteed the investment, unless he expressly undertook the duty of selecting the investment.[2] He was bound to exercise due professional care and skill in the matter of title, but beyond that his duty and responsibility, merely as a law-agent, did not go. It had never been held that a law-agent who submitted proposals for investment to his client's judgment incurred professional responsibility for the soundness of the investments, even if he gave his opinion on that matter, whether asked or unasked. Dicta there might be to that effect, but they were obiter,[3] and in England such liability, apart from express undertaking, had been negatived.[4] The law-agent incurred responsibility only if his advice was wrong in law,—if, for instance, he had advised an investment forbidden by the trust-deed or by the common law regarding trust investments. Possibly, if the investment, though in form within the powers of the trustees, were so bad that no competent law-agent could have advised it, the law-agent might incur responsibility, but it must come up to that, mere imprudence was not enough. If the agent gave his opinion on the soundness of an investment, it was merely his opinion, which the trustees might disregard.

Now, this investment was certainly within the powers of the trustees, which were very wide. It was a heritable security. Prima facie therefore a law-agent advising its acceptance committed no breach of his professional duty. It was a security, no doubt, over uncompleted buildings, but the buildings were completed before the whole sum lent was advanced, and no loss was shewn to have arisen by reason of their non-completion. The question, therefore, with the present defenders at anyrate, must be taken exactly as if the buildings had been complete from the first, unless it could be shewn that to advance trust money on the security of unfinished buildings was ipso facto illegal, and Wyllie Guild's[5] case was appealed to in support of such a rule. That case laid down no general rule affecting trustees at least, for in the first place the buildings never were completed, and secondly the question arose with a judicial factor, whose powers as an officer of Court were very different from trustees' under a deed like the present. Whiteley's[1] case in England repudiated the alleged rule. The investment here might possibly have been an imprudent one, but it was really out of the question to say that it was so imprudent as to involve the law-agents in responsibility. It was just such an investment as was matter of everyday business in Glasgow, which no law-agent, at that time, would have thought of objecting to.

But if the law-agents were responsible for having advised an investment so imprudent as to render the trustees liable to the beneficiaries, that did not give the beneficiaries a right of action against the law-agents, inasmuch as the advice which they had given was advice given to the trustees as individuals and not as trustees. The duty of trustees was to exercise a sound discretion in regard to the investment of the trust funds, and that duty they were not entitled to delegate. Matters of title or matters of stockbroking were different, trustees not being, as such, either lawyers or stockbrokers, and such matters, therefore, they might delegate, and were thereby probably freed from responsibility if they took sufficient care in the choice of their lawyer or stockbroker. It followed, therefore, that trustees who pleaded the culpa of their lawyer or stockbroker, in answer to the beneficiaries, must sue the lawyer or stockbroker, or give the beneficiaries their instance. In matters which trustees might delegate they were in truth the agents merely of the beneficiaries. On the other hand, if to aid them in the exercise of their discretion as to the choice of investments trustees consulted their lawyer, or anyone else, that might give them a right of action against the lawyer, if they themselves were found liable to the beneficiaries, but whether they sued the lawyer or not was no concern of the beneficiaries. In matters falling within the proper province of trustees all that the beneficiaries had to look to was the personal responsibility and individual discretion of the trustees.

At all events, the present action, directed as it was against both the law-agents and the trustees as jointly and severally liable, was incompetent. If the matter was one properly within the duty of the law-agent to the trust, that might free the trustees; if it was a case for the discretion of the trustees personally, then in suing them the beneficiaries necessarily absolved the law-agents. There was no case in which the beneficiaries were held entitled to sue both the trustees and the agents. If they adopted the delegation to the agents the trustees were free. If they repudiated the action of the trustees in consulting the agents, the agents were free. The liability of the one involved the immunity of the other. The claim against the trustees assumed that they were not entitled to delegate; the claim against the agents assumed that they were.[2] To allow a joint action against both was to put the defenders to an undue disadvantage. They suffered prejudice from the pursuer's being able to take up first the one ground of action—as against the trustees, and then the other—as against the agents. Further, both being defenders, the trustees were unable to cross-examine Meek,[3] whose evidence therefore, could not be looked at as in a question with the agents. The agents if sued by the trustees were entitled to plead all personal exceptions open to them, but of this they were deprived if the beneficiaries had a direct action against them. The beneficiaries had no direct action against ordinary debtors to the trust,[1] and there was no reason why they should have such an action against the agents. A judgment in such an action would not be res judicata as between the trustees and the agents.

Lastly, the interest of the present beneficiaries was merely a contingent interest. They ought not therefore to be permitted to sue what was in substance an action of damages. They could not qualify present damage, and might never suffer any. Possibly as against the trustees they might have a title to sue, notwithstanding the contingent nature of their interest, for that might give them a title to have the funds restored if the trustees were in fault in losing them, but as against the agents the ground of action was simply breach of contract, and the conclusion was for damages and nothing else.

At advising,—

Lord President.—This is an action against the surviving and accepting trustees under the marriage-contract of the Rev. Robert Reid Rae, and the lady who is now his spouse, and whose maiden name was Miss Jessie Croil. The object of the action is to have a certain sum replaced in the trust which has been lost, as it is said, by the breach of trust or misconduct of the defenders. The action is also directed against the law-agents who acted in the trust, and one of the peculiarities of the case is that the conclusions of the summons are directed against all these defenders, the trustees and also the law-agents "conjunctly and severally, or severally, or in such other way or manner as to our Lords shall seem just."

The surviving and acting trustees, as I understand, are the two spouses (the lady, Mrs Rae, being a sine qua non), Mr Meek, and another reverend gentleman, who is described in the marriage-contract as a student of divinity, but who is now, like the truster, a minister of the Church of Scotland.

The provisions of the marriage-contract are simple enough. The intending husband had nothing to settle on his wife but his furniture, and the only other obligation he undertook was to be punctual in the payment of his rates to the Ministers' Widows Fund. But Miss Croil had some fortune of her own which she derived from her father, and it turned out to be £5000.

The lady's fortune is settled in this way. It is given to herself in the first place in liferent. If her husband predeceases her, then it reverts to her in absolute property, and there is an end of the trust. But if she predeceases her husband, then the husband enjoys a liferent of the money, and after his death it goes to their children. These children are the pursuers of the present action.

The case against Mr Hotson,—or against the representative of Mr Hotson,—who was the family solicitor, and the law-agent in the trust, is that he recommended to the trustees a very bad investment for the trust money, which has in consequence been lost, and the contention against him is that he is bound, just as much as the trustees who made the investment, to replace the money which has been lost to the trust-estate.

Now, it appears to me that this action does not lie against Mr Hotson or his representative at the instance of these pursuers. It must be observed that they have no vested right or interest in the trust-estate or any part of it. Their eventual and contingent interest depends on a variety of circumstances. If their mother survives their father, they never will have any interest in the trust funds. They may of course succeed to their mother as her executors if she dies intestate, or she may provide for them in any way she thinks fit, but they can never in the event of her survivance of her husband have any interest in this trust. They must also survive both their parents before they can have any interest in this trust; I think that is the only other contingency on which their right depends. I do not think, therefore, that parties in such a position as the pursuers occupy, and with this sort of right and interest in the trust-estate, have any title to sue the law-agent. The law-agent is employed by the trustees, and of course he is responsible to them for any professional negligence or want of skill which may be shewn in advising them or in conducting the affairs of the trust. That liability arises out of a contract of employment, and it may be that if the trustees were suing the law-agent for liability under that contract of employment, the form of action might be that which we have here —that is to say, a demand in the form of a conclusion that the law-agent should replace the money which had been lost may be a suitable enough form of action. But the position of these pursuers with regard to this law-agent is entirely different. There is no contract of employment between him and them. Therefore the same liability cannot exist as exists on the part of the law-agent to the trustees; it must be a different kind of liability altogether. I doubt whether any liability at all exists, because I think there is no foundation for the law-agent's liability except a contract of employment, and to such a contract of employment in this case the pursuers are not parties.

[1] Mackay, C. of S. Practice, i. 280, and cases there.

But even suppose it should be held that the law-agent is answerable to these pursuers for any loss or damage which they may have sustained, is this a sort of action that can be maintained? I apprehend not. The only action that would then lie at the instance of the present pursuers would be an action for any loss or damage they themselves have sustained through the breach of trust and the loss of the money. Now, they have sustained no damage, and it is not clear that they ever will sustain any damage. Certainly they will sustain no damage if their mother survives their father, because then they would cease to have any interest in the trust, and they will not sustain any damage if they do not survive both their parents. Still more, should they come to have an interest in this trust-estate, quomodo constat that this money may not by that time have been replaced, and so not lost to the trust? It may be replaced by the trustees, or some of them, being found liable to replace this money. It may be replaced—although this is not a very probable contingency—by an improvement in the security. At all events, one thing is perfectly clear, and that is, that the pursuers have as yet suffered no damage, and it is extremely doubtful whether they will suffer any damage by the fault imputed to the law-agent. I am taking it for granted that the fault imputed to the law-agent in this action is professional negligence or fault. It may be doubtful whether it is what it is described as being in the summons or the condescendence, but I am assuming that for the sake of argument in dealing with questions of the law-agent's liability, and I come to the conclusion that this action cannot be maintained against him.

The case against the trustees of course stands in a very different position, because an allegation made by parties interested even eventually under a trust-deed that by the misconduct of the trustees a large portion of the trust-estate has been lost by being invested on a bad security, is prima facie a perfectly competent and relevant ground of action. But this case is very peculiar in some of its circumstances. The defenders called are the whole accepting and surviving trustees, but only one of them has appeared to defend the action. Mr and Mrs Reid Rae do not appear at all, and the other reverend gentleman also fails to appear, so that Mr Meek is the only defender. Therefore the case is narrowed to this question, whether Mr Meek is to be made answerable to replace this money.

Now, it must be taken for granted here, I think, in dealing with this question, that this was a very bad security. I do not think anybody can say a word in its favour. The circumstances under which it was taken appear in the minutes of the meetings of the trustees. The money had been invested previously in a different way, but it required to be reinvested. The first minute with which we are concerned bears this (it is dated 30th January 1874):—"It being necessary to reinvest the two sums to be received at Whitsunday, it was resolved to look for heritable securities of adequate value, and Mr Hotson was directed to be on the outlook for such, and to report to the trustees any proposals he might receive." Upon the 5th May Mr Hotson did report accordingly, and the minute of that day's meeting bears:—"There were laid before the meeting rentals and valuations of several heritable properties on which loans were wanted, after considering and comparing which the trustees resolved to make a loan of four thousand five hundred pounds (£4500) to Mr William Anderson, one of the applicants, on the security of buildings in Gallowgate, valued by Mr Burnet, architect, at £6500: Provided always that Mr Hotson shall be satisfied with the title, and that such part of the loan shall be deposited in bank, in the joint names of the parties' law-agents, as Mr Burnet shall judge to be sufficient for finishing the buildings, to be drawn out and paid over to Mr Anderson when Mr Burnet shall, at his expense, report the full completion of the work."

Now, one great objection to a security of this kind is that the work may never be completed. That objection does not occur in the present case. The work was completed, and the money was afterwards paid in terms of this minute. But the failure of the security arose from this, that the erection of buildings of the character of those which were erected in this locality—that is, in the Gallowgate of Glasgow—was in itself a very great risk and an experiment, and turned out to be an entirely unsuccessful experiment. There had never been buildings of that description in that part of the town before. It was thought that they would take the market, but they did not, and the consequence is that this money cannot be recovered.

Mr Meek's share in these proceedings consisted in this, that he was present at the meetings. There were also present, however, the husband and the wife, who were the parties directly and immediately interested in this money and in the investment, and Mr Hotson, the law-agent. The question thus comes to be, whether, if Mr and Mrs Rae, the parties chiefly interested in the money, desired to have this investment, and Mr Hotson advised the trustees to accept it, Mr Meek must nevertheless be held personally answerable for the loss of the money. One cannot help seeing at once that that is a hard position in which to place Mr Meek, and I humbly think that in the circumstances Mr Meek is not liable.

It is said that a trustee must under all circumstances shew in the conduct of trust affairs all the prudence and intelligence that a prudent man would shew in the management of his own affairs. I am not quite sure that that is either a very definite or a very satisfactory statement of the ground of liability of a trustee—that he has failed to exercise that amount of prudence which a prudent man would use in the conduct of his own affairs—because there are many degrees of prudence. One man is a great deal more prudent than another, and one man is a great deal more intelligent than another, and it must depend a good deal on the prudence and intelligence of the particular trustee whether he is to blame or not. If he brings to the consideration of the question before the trustees all the mental capacity with which he is endowed, can he be expected to do more? I rather think that the rule of liability in such a case is much better stated by Lord Stair than in any of the more recent cases. He says, Stair, i. 12, 10,—"By the nature of the contract, mandators, seeing their undertakings are gratuitous, ought to be but liable for such diligence as they use in their own affairs, and the mandant ought to impute it to himself that he made not choice of a more diligent person, which our custom follows, but still there must be bona fides." Now, if we apply that rule to the present case we must not demand of Mr Meek any more prudence or diligence or knowledge than he actually possesses and uses in the management of his own business. For that purpose we must consider what Mr Meek is.

Mr Meek is a man who has been in business, but who has retired from it a long time ago. He was a West India merchant, but that was forty or fifty years ago. He is now a landed proprietor in Lanarkshire, and not apparently engaged in any business. He was a personal friend of Mr and Mrs Rae, and was induced by them to give them his assistance and advice as a trustee, and I think they must be held to be answerable for making a judicious or injudicious choice in the selection of Mr Meek. That is the view of Lord Stair, and I think it a very sound one. Now, judging from Mr Meek's actings and proceedings in this trust business, and from his evidence, he does not appear to me to be a man of business habits, or a man of great intelligence or great discretion. But he certainly had sense enough to do this. When he saw what kind of security this was that Mr and Mrs Reid Rae wanted to take for the trust-money, he consulted the law-agent, and asked him whether this was a proper kind of security to take, and the advice he got, according to his own statement at least, was that it was quite a common security, and that there was no difficulty about it. There is no contradiction of that statement, and looking to the candour with which Mr Meek's evidence is given throughout his deposition, I think that we are well entitled to take that to be proved as matter of fact.

There is one other consideration that weighs with me with respect to the position of Mr Meek as I have described it, and that is the clause of immunity in the trust-deed. It is very strongly expressed, and I think goes a long way to support the conclusion at which I am disposed to arrive. In the first place, there is a discretion as to the sort of investments which the trustees are to take, and the sort of investment they are to take includes heritable securities, and this is undoubtedly a heritable security, although it is not a good one. There may be very bad heritable securities, and of course the meaning of the clause I am now referring to is not that the trustees have power to take bad heritable securities, but that they are to have power to take heritable securities, and they are to be the judges of how far they are to go in that direction. But then it is declared that the trustees shall not be answerable for "errors, omissions, or neglect of diligence, nor for the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases." Now, what can be charged against Mr Meek here? You may charge against him certainly that he committed an error—an error of judgment, and a very serious error of judgment. You may charge against him also that he was guilty of neglect of diligence; and ~~we~~ you are certainly entitled to charge against him that he has taken an insufficient security. But these are three things for which the trust-deed says that he is not to be answerable. They are just the very things from which he is protected; errors, which means errors of judgment, neglect of diligence, and insufficient security. Can anyone charge anything more against him in this case? I think not. I have not heard anything more against Mr Meek than that he committed an error of judgment, that he neglected to be diligent—that is, prudent—and that the security which he accepted has turned out to be insufficient. If these are the only things which can be charged against him, then is it not plain that according to the very letter of this marriage-contract, he is not to be answerable for these things?

These are the grounds on which I think Mr Meek ought to be assoilzied.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with your Lordship. The only doubt I have had was with regard to the liability of the law-agent for advising this investment, but on the whole matter I am inclined to think that at all events there is no case relevantly stated on the part of these pursuers against the agent. Therefore, I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived on both points.

LORD MURE.—This case is attended with a good deal of difficulty, but after full consideration I have come to the conclusion that the defender Mr Meek is liable to make good to the trust-estate the money that has been lost through the investment in question. I do not think that it was an illegal investment, as contended by the pursuers, in the sense of being beyond the defender's power or authority to make; because the trustees had power to invest in heritable security, and this is an investment of that description. But I think it was an improper investment for a trustee to make of the funds committed to his care, and so imprudent as to subject him in liability for the loss.

In dealing with questions of this kind, the rule according to which the conduct of gratuitous trustees falls to be judged is that they require to exercise the same prudence which a man of ordinary care would take in the management of his affairs. The law was so laid down in this Court by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of Kennedy, 12 R. 379, after apparently considerable discussion, where his Lordship says that gratuitous trustees are liable only in such diligence as "a man of ordinary prudence would use in his own affairs," and other cases were quoted to a similar effect. The question, therefore, for consideration upon the evidence is whether the defender acted with that prudence in lending the trust-funds in the way he did.

Now, the evidence as to the nature of this investment is very distinct. It was an investment on house property which was in the course of erection when the advance was agreed to. The subject, therefore, which was to yield a rent to pay the interest on the loan, was not in existence when the loan was made, and was not finished for some months after the loan was made—not I think till October 1875, when the last instalment was paid up. It is plain, moreover, upon the evidence, that this was well known to the defender, because it was made matter of arrangement, when the loan was agreed to in the spring of 1874, that a very considerable portion of the money was to be retained by the agent for the trustees, and only to be paid up on certificates from the architect that the work certified had been finished to his satisfaction.

It does not, moreover, appear that at the date of the loan any part of the property had been let, or was capable of being let. There was, therefore, no actually existing rental which could then be relied on; and all that the trustees appear to have had before them were speculative rentals of what the property might probably yield. There was in the next place a ground-annual of £190 payable out of the rents, which had of course precedence to the loan, and it is plain that at the date of the loan there were no rents then fixed which would be available to meet that payment when it fell due. The locality again was not a good one. It was not a part of the town of Glasgow where houses of the same description had been built before; and I see no evidence to instruct that rents were at any time drawn sufficient to meet the amount of the ground-annual.

Such being the nature of the investment, it is to my mind difficult to see from what source, apart from the personal security of the borrower, the interest was to come. There were no rents current, and in cases of this description it is necessary that there should be a reliable security for payment of the interest, as well as of the capital of the loan, which there plainly was not in the present case. The investment, therefore, was in my opinion upon the whole a very bad one. It was a very risky looking affair at best, of a very speculative description, and one which no man of ordinary prudence would, I think, have entered upon in the management of his own affairs; and still less was it one in which a trustee was justified in investing the greater part, if not the whole, of the trust funds committed to his charge.

The defender was evidently very doubtful himself about the security, and says he consulted the agent for the trust as explained in the passage referred to by your Lordship. But I am unable to look upon this as a sufficient justification for what the defender here did, even assuming it to be proved that the agent gave him the answer the defender says he did. The defender was not, as I conceive, warranted in advancing the trust funds upon a security which he himself distrusted because the agent told him that parties were sometimes in use to advance money on questionable securities of a similar description. And when an agent thus gives his client bad advice, that cannot, in my opinion, in such a case, free the client from the responsibility which would otherwise attach to his conduct.

In this matter of the sufficiency of the money value of a security I have always understood that it was the client who was to judge and deal with that question, and not the agent. I think the minutes of the trustees to which your Lordship referred bear that out and proceed on that footing. The first is dated the 30th of January 1874, and it says—"It being necessary to reinvest the two sums thus to be received at Whitsunday, it was resolved to look for heritable securities of adequate value, and Mr Hotson was directed to be on the outlook for such, and to report to the trustees any proposals he might receive. In case the funds, or any part thereof, should not be thus taken up, it was resolved to deposit the uninvested money in the Glasgow branch of the Royal Bank on deposit-receipt in favour of the Messrs Rae and Mr Meek on behalf of the trustees." Then the matter came up again on the 5th of May, and the minute of that meeting bears,—"There were laid before the meeting rentals and valuations of several heritable properties on which loans were wanted, after considering and comparing which"—it was the trustees who did that—"the trustees resolved to make a loan of four thousand five hundred pounds (£4500) to Mr William Anderson, one of the applicants, on the security of buildings in the Gallowgate, valued by Mr Burnet, architect, at £6500; provided always that Mr Hotson shall be satisfied with the title." There is thus a clear distinction drawn between what the trustees and their agent were respectively to deal with. I put the question to counsel in the course of the discussion whether, when a party employed his agent to get a security for him, the agent became responsible for the sufficiency in value of the security, and the answer was that unless there was a special arrangement by which the agent undertook that liability he was not responsible; and I did not understand that to be disputed. Judging from what I have seen myself, I think that what is generally done is this. Rentals are laid before the parties making the loan. These rentals shew what is the revenue of the security and what burdens are on it, and what is the margin which is over for payment of the interest on any money that may be advanced, and the agent leaves it to the client to say whether he is satisfied with the value of the security. The agent's responsibility, in my view of it, applies to the title, and to seeing that the security is in that respect a good security for his client to take. That is what the agent has to look after; but in the matter of value it is the client whose money is to be laid out who has to be satisfied. Now, in this case the security before us is plainly one which a trustee ought not to have taken, and the defender having been himself of opinion that the security was at least a doubtful one, it was his duty to have declined it, and so to have protected the trust-estate against the risk of any such loss as that which has here been sustained. As regards the clause of immunity in the trust-deed, I am of opinion that, when the mistake is so flagrant as that which we have here to consider, the clause is not sufficient to protect the trustee, and it has, I think, been substantially so decided in cases of a somewhat similar description.

On the question of the law-agent's liability, I am of opinion that he is not responsible for the loss which has here arisen. What the agent undertakes, as I have already explained, in such an investment, is that the title offered by the borrower is a good one, and that the security will in that respect be duly constituted. But he does not, as I apprehend, undertake to guarantee the sufficiency in value of the security, unless under some special arrangement to that effect.

Now, I do not see anything in the minutes I have referred to which can be held to impose liability on the agent for allowing the trustee to make an advance on what turned out to be an insufficient security, or to shew that the agent undertook any responsibility in that respect; and I do not think any such responsibility arises under the ordinary employment of an agent when an investment is made. The agent is in such a case responsible only for mistakes as to the title, and completion of the security; and unless he is specially employed to see to the value of the security, he does not incur any additional responsibility if the security turns out to be of insufficient value. If the rule were otherwise it would come to this, that agents would in all cases be held to guarantee their clients against such loss as has here occurred; and that is a position in which it seems to me no agents can be expected to place themselves, except under some special arrangement. I never understood that the fee paid to an agent on the advance of money under an heritable security had any relation to the risk that might arise from the security turning out to be of insufficient value. And as it is not alleged in the present case that there has been any mistake made as to the

No. 178. titles, or as to the completion of the security, I am of opinion that the claim against the agent cannot be maintained.

Rae v. Meek.

LORD SHAND.—In regard to the question of liability of the agents, I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the pursuers of this action have no title to sue; I also concur with my brother Lord Mure in thinking that, even if the pursuers had a good title to maintain the action against the agents, liability against them has not been established.

It appears to me that a law-agent's proper professional duty and obligation is to see that the title to the security which is proposed to be taken shall be in all respects valid and effectual. Prima facie I do not think his duty goes further. He may undertake more, and in the course of their employment law-agents often do undertake more, but if nothing more is undertaken, that appears to me to be the limit of the agent's professional duty. In dealing with the question of title to sue, however, I will assume that there was a failure to perform a duty in a matter in which responsibility has arisen to the trustees as representing the beneficiaries, as, for example, in taking a bad title to a heritable security. In that case it appears to me the persons entitled to maintain an action against the law-agents for failure to perform a professional duty are the trustees and not the beneficiaries. The trustees are the employers of the law-agents. The direct relation of employment arises between them, while no such relation exists between the beneficiaries and the law-agents. It is true that the employment which a law-agent undertakes for the benefit of the trust-estate is for the benefit of the beneficiaries, but the persons who are to vindicate the rights of the trust-estate are, in my opinion, the trustees who are vested with the management, and not the beneficiaries. Suppose an agent to fail in professional duty, and loss to be thereby caused, what is the nature of the claim that arises against him? He has committed a breach of duty, or failed to exercise professional skill. The claim against him is one of damages, and the measure of the claim is the loss which he has caused to the estate. Trustees are in a different position, for they may be required to replace money lost by the beneficiaries merely objecting to their taking credit for the amount in their trust accounts. But the law-agent in the case supposed is simply a debtor to the estate in respect of a claim of damages. Can it then be maintained that debtors to trust-estates may be called in actions by any of the beneficiaries who think fit to do so? Persons may owe debts to a trust-estate on a great many grounds. A truster may die having a great many debts owing to him. If the trustees do not think fit to raise an action against the debtors for certain debts, having doubts it may be how far they may be certain of success, is it for a beneficiary or beneficiaries to do so in their own name? I think they have no such right. And I do not think this is a matter of mere form; it is, in my view, a matter of substance, because if the law were otherwise, then the debtors of trust-estates, including amongst them law-agents who may have been employed by the trustees, would be liable to actions at the instance of many different persons—of anyone having a beneficial interest in the trust-estate—requiring them to pay the amount of their debts to the trustees. I think such actions are not competent, and that the only persons who can maintain actions to recover debts due to an executry or trust-estate are the administrators of the estate, the trustees or the executors. A beneficiary could not discharge the liability for a claim due to the trustees, and I do not see that a judgment in an action at the instance of a beneficiary could be res judicata in a question with the trustees. It appears to me that the law would get into extreme confusion if we were to sanction actions of this kind raised by a beneficiary against one with whom he had no contract. The beneficiary has his rights against the trustees, for the trustees are in direct relation with him because of their having undertaken a trust for his behoof. But if beneficiaries seek to enforce by action a claim of any kind against a debtor to the trust, it appears to me that they must either compel the trustees to raise the question directly in their own names, or get authority to use their names, or get an assignation to the claim, and thereupon sue as assignees.

Rae v. Meek.

In my opinion therefore there is no title in this case to sue this action.

But further, I concur with your Lordship in thinking that, as in a question with the agents, this is an action of damages, and as it is clear that the present pursuers are unable to qualify present damage (for it may be that there may be no damage suffered by them at all), that is a second ground for holding that this is an ill-founded action against the agents. I shall only make this additional observation on this branch of the case, that if the agents' liability were sought to be enforced because of their having given bad advice when asked to advise as to whether the trustees would incur personal responsibility in making the investment now complained of, I should hold that this would give rise to a claim personal to the trustees, to be made by them alone, and to which the beneficiaries never could get right, unless the claim was assigned to them by the trustees. So that, looking at the case in any view that can be taken of it, it humbly appears to me that there is no title to sue as against the law-agents.

But I am further of opinion with my brother Lord Mure, and on the grounds he has stated at the close of his opinion, that there is no liability on the part of the agents even if the pursuer had a title to maintain the action. I do not think there is any ground of liability averred in this action, for it is not alleged on record that they were employed to perform any duties beyond the ordinary duties of a law-agent.

It is for the trustees themselves to judge of the propriety of making an investment of the trust-funds, to select the investment or to sanction it, and that duty they are not entitled to devolve either on their law-agent or anyone else whose advice and assistance they may very properly take to enable them to arrive at a sound judgment. The security having been resolved upon, the agent's ordinary professional duty is, as I have already said, to see that a valid title is completed. No other duty or obligation arises from the mere relationship of agent and client, although in the case of trustees I should further be prepared to hold that if an agent is consulted about an investment which the trustees propose to make, and which—being in the knowledge of the terms of the trust-deed—he has reason to think would be beyond the powers committed to them, he is bound to warn them of this. He may undertake further duties. His undertaking may arise either from express employment or from circumstances which shew that it was the understanding of himself and his client that his duties should not be limited merely to seeing to the validity of the title. He may be asked to inquire for and report upon securities for the consideration of his client, and may undertake to do so. This is so often done by law-agents that it might almost be said to be part of their ordinary duties as law-agents, but I do not so regard it, for trustees themselves, or persons with whom they are acquainted, may look out for suitable securities for trust-funds just as an agent may do. Where this duty is undertaken, it is of course incumbent on the agent to give the fullest information he can obtain in regard to the security, and especially to inform his client of any disadvantage or drawback to the security of which he is aware, and which the client may not justly be expected to know, but which it is material that he should know. His duty does not go further or involve any responsibility for the sufficiency of the security. The agent's failure to give full information when he was bound to do so seems to me the true ground of judgment in the case of Ronaldson v. Drummond & Reid, 8 R. 767, as Lord Fraser has pointed out in his opinion in the case of Stirling, 14 R. 177.

Still further, a law-agent may, expressly or by his conduct, undertake not only to report upon securities for the consideration of his client, but to select and take a security for a client who devolves that duty entirely on him, and in this special case, in which the client trusts entirely to him, he becomes of course bound to use all reasonable care that the investment is a safe and proper one. In such a case the law-agent, by agreeing to do all that the client would do for himself, undertakes at the least the whole duties and obligations which devolve upon a trustee making investments of trust-funds. The case of Oastler, 14 R. 12, is an illustration of this class of case, for there the lady trusted entirely to her agents to make an investment for her, and in the case of Black v. Curror & Cowper, 12 R. 990, the law-agents undertook not merely to see to the validity of the title, but to the sufficiency of the security.

In the present case there is no averment of any undertaking under a special employment. All that the agent was asked to do was, in terms of the minute of 30th January 1874, "to be on the outlook for securities, and to report to the trustees any proposals he might receive." Then came the meeting at which the proposals received were reported, and the trustees agreed to take the security in question. Now, the single piece of evidence regarding what occurred at the meeting as presented by the pursuers, beyond the terms of the minute itself, is to be found in the testimony of Mrs Rae. She was examined about what occurred at the meeting, and what she says is this,—"What were you told at the meeting about the investment? (A.) That an investment would be found; it was not found, but would be found. Perhaps it was found by the meeting of the 5th May. (Q.) What else were you told? (A.) That it was a first-class investment—a good investment. (Q.) Who told you that? (A.) Mr Hotson and Mr Meek." She passes from that to say something about the ground-annual, and then this question is put,—"Who did you rely on? (A.) Mr Meek. (Q.) Anyone else? (A.) No, he took the management. (Q.) Did you rely on Mr Hotson? (A.) No, I did not think of him." Now, that is the sole evidence in this case as to the part taken by Mr Hotson, the agent, in the proceedings at the meeting of the 5th May. The pursuers examined Mrs Rae, but not Mr Meek, or anyone else present at the meeting, and what I have read is all that Mrs Rae has to say on the subject. What it amounts to really is, that the law-agent at that meeting, in conversation with the trustees, expressed his opinion that the security was a good one—an opinion which it is not doubted he honestly entertained. I cannot see any ground for holding that this should infer responsibility on his part for the sufficiency of the security. He was asked merely to inquire about securities, and report any proposals to the meeting. He did not undertake to perform the duty of the trustees—to judge of the proposed investment, and to sanction it. That the trustees did for themselves, and having done so, they directed the law-agent to see that a satisfactory title was obtained.

Persons with money to invest frequently consult brokers about their investments. The broker who gets a commission for his trouble on any transaction he carries through is frequently asked for advice, and recommends particular investments. Advice honestly given often turns out bad and results in loss, but it is needless to observe that no one would think of maintaining that the broker was liable in damages. I am unable to distinguish between the two cases—the case of a broker and the case of a law-agent in the position of the agent here. Both are paid for their services, the broker for purchasing the required stock and having the title by transfer completed; the law-agent for attendance at the trustees' meetings, and for completing the title to the security which the trustees decide to take; neither of them undertakes to see to the sufficiency of the investment.

There is a further passage in the proof which the pursuers sought to found upon in regard to the agent's responsibility—I mean the passage in the evidence of Mr Meek, who was examined on his own behalf—which is in these terms—"(Q.) Do you remember discussing Mr Anderson's loan? (A.) I remember that with respect to the Gallowgate. I was not much pleased with it, but great improvements had been made by the Improvement Trust, and it was becoming a very valuable part of the city. When Mr Anderson's application was laid before us I pointedly put the question to Mr Hotson whether we were doing right in lending upon a property that was in the course of being built. He answered that there could be no objection on that score—that it was a matter of common, almost daily, occurrence in Glasgow." Now, in so far as that is of any value in the case it is evidence for Mr Meek, and for Mr Meek alone. The pursuers had closed their case in a question with the law-agent, and any evidence which the pursuers had led upon that matter was in the course of Mrs Rae's deposition. Mr Meek is entitled to the benefit of this evidence as against the pursuers, but it cannot be taken into view in the question between them and the law-agents. It would, I think, be unjust that it should be taken. The evidence was not led by the pursuers, and there was no arrangement that the evidence of Mr Meek should be taken as part of the general evidence in the case as in a question between all the parties. But I am bound to say, further, that even if Mr Meek's evidence were any part of the pursuers' case, it would not affect the conclusion to which I have come. For the question put to Mr Hotson was not put to him as a lawyer—it was not such a question as this, "Are we, the trustees, acting within our powers?" or, "Are we doing anything ultra vires, looking to the terms of the trust-deed?" It was simply this, "Are we right in lending on property that is being built—is it a security which your judgment would recommend?" His answer was that there could be no objection on that score—that it was a matter of common, almost daily, occurrence in Glasgow, and there is only too good reason to think that that was the practice. Being invited to give his opinion on the propriety of the investment by the parties present, he did so, but I cannot see that he undertook any responsibility in consequence. It was very well put by the Dean of Faculty that the test of this was, had Mr Hotson any power to control an investment? I quite think that if an illegal investment was proposed—one ultra vires of the trustees, because the deed prohibited anything of the kind—Mr Hotson would have been bound as the law-agent to advise the trustees of this, and if he failed to do so might and probably would have incurred responsibility. But if what occurred was simply an expression of opinion as to the quality of the security, as I think it was, then Mr Hotson undertook no responsibility, because he was not charged with the duty of making the investment, and had no control over the trustees in the matter. If indeed the case could be brought up to this, that under the deed a certain class of investment was prohibited, and if the law-agent, as a lawyer, ought to have advised them that the investment was beyond their power, that would have raised a different question. But I do not think that the facts here raise a question of that kind. For these reasons I am of opinion that even if the pursuers had a title to sue the agents, they have not proved any grounds for holding the agents responsible.

But with regard to Mr Meek, I am of opinion with Lord Mure that a case of responsibility has been made out. Your Lordship, I think, said that the investment was a bad one. Lord Mure said he thinks it about as bad as could be, and I am rather of Lord Mure's opinion on that point. In the first place, the subject of the security was an enormous block of buildings in the course of being built, involving an outlay of some £25,000 or £30,000, and the loan was to be given on a part of the buildings which was unfinished. It is true, as your Lordship has observed, that the building ultimately was finished, and no doubt Mr Meek is entitled to the benefit of that circumstance. If the unfinished character of the building had been the only objection to the investment, it was undoubtedly cured in the end. But besides being unfinished, and so of the class of property condemned in the case of Wyllie Guild, 14 R. 944, these buildings were necessarily untenanted, and there was a very large amount of space to be filled up before any rental could be drawn from the property. Then there was a ground-annual, amounting to about £200 a-year, forming a preferable burden over that part of the property on which the loan was to be given. It also appears that the trustees lent £4500, while the actual outlay on the building was only about £4000. It further appears, and I think this is the main blot on the investment, that the buildings were erected by Mr Anderson as a speculation. He proposed to open warehouses of a class unknown in that locality, and which were to be tried for the first time to the east of the Cross of Glasgow. Warehouses had never existed there before. The result turned out as might have been anticipated. A great part of the buildings have remained untenanted, and the portion with which we are more immediately concerned has never produced rent enough to cover the ground-annual. It is further to be borne in mind that the transaction was taken up and closed at a single meeting of the trustees, and the only valuation, and that not a detailed valuation, which was laid before the meeting, was one sent in by the proposed borrower, and made by a gentleman who had been employed on his behalf. It was a mere statement of opinion by Mr Burnet, no doubt a man of eminence in his profession. But all the trustees had to go upon was his opinion that the buildings when completed and papered and painted would be worth so much on the assumption that they would then be let. The data on which Mr Burnet proceeded were not given in his report, and no data were asked for or laid before the trustees to enable them to test the value of Mr Burnet's opinion. I think with Lord Mure that, taking all the circumstances I have mentioned into account, the security is one which must be condemned. It is not a security which any prudent man exercising reasonable care would have accepted in the management of his own affairs. The test in this class of cases is, and I think must remain, that a trustee must shew such reasonable care as a man of ordinary prudence would exercise. I think Mr Meek, though acting with complete bona fides, entirely failed to shew that care.

The last point to which I have alluded, the general terms of the valuation and the absence of all data to justify it, seem to be sufficient to shew that the investment was made without that reasonable care which a man of ordinary prudence would exercise, and was therefore an investment which the trustees were not warranted in making. In the recent case of Learoyd, L. R., 12 App. Cases, Lord Watson said, p. 734,—"If trustees employ a person of competent skill to value a real security, they may, so long as they act in good faith, rely upon the correctness of his valuation. But the ordinary course of business does not justify the employment of a valuator for any other purpose than obtaining the data necessary in order to enable the trustees to judge of the sufficiency of the security offered. They are not in safety to rely upon his bare assurance that the security is sufficient in the absence of detailed information which would enable them to form an opinion, and without forming an opinion for themselves,—at all events if they choose to place reliance upon his opinion without the means of testing its soundness, they cannot, should the security prove defective, escape from personal liability, unless they prove that the security was such as would have been accepted by a trustee of ordinary prudence fully informed of its character, and having in view the principles to which I have already adverted."

If this had been a question with Mr and Mrs Rae as pursuers, I should have seen very good grounds for holding that they could not succeed, for they themselves were parties to the proceedings complained of. But unfortunately for Mr Meek there are other beneficiaries whose interests he as well as Mr and Mrs Rae were bound to protect. Those interests no doubt are contingent, but they exist, and the trustees had a duty to those parties, the present pursuers.

I concur with Lord Mure in thinking that it is no answer in a case of this kind that the trustees consulted a law-agent. I have read the passage in the evidence upon that matter. I think the trustees merely asked the agent as to his view of the value of the security. That was a matter on which he would naturally give his opinion if asked, but without thereby incurring any responsibility if he gave an honest opinion. It will not free the trustees from liability that they acted on the opinion of anyone else, even of their law-agent, in regard to a matter as to which it was for them to judge, and responsibility for which lay with them.

It has been suggested that a new principle for determining the liability of trustees should be adopted—perhaps I am wrong in calling it new, as it is founded on the passage from Lord Stair which your Lordship has read. The suggestion, as I understand it, is that responsibility for improper investments should depend on the capacity of the trustee, so that one trustee, if a person of intelligence and ability, might be held responsible, while another of less business capacity would not be so. If the trustee is able to say, "Well, it is quite true I have made a very bad investment, but I am a very stupid man," it is said that he shall be free from responsibility. I do not think a principle of that kind can receive effect in the administration of the law of trusts. If it were to be introduced now, and made a foundation for legal decision, the issue in each case would come to be, what was the capacity of the trustee? and it is easy to see that this would open up a very curious inquiry, and leave the Court with no settled rules or principles to be applied as cases occurred. We must, I think, keep to the much broader rule, and the only rule which we can proceed upon is that which has been recognised for years, namely, that a trustee shall be responsible if he does not in the transaction challenged shew the reasonable care which a man of ordinary prudence shews in the conduct of his own affairs. On that point I may quote the words of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Learoyd, at p. 731,—"I do not think it is true to say that one is entitled to consider the special qualities or degree of intelligence of a particular trustee. Persons who accept that office must be supposed to accept it with the responsibility at all events for a position of ordinary care and prudence."

I have only further to say, in regard to the clause of immunity founded upon, that I do not think it will relieve Mr Meek of responsibility in this case. By that clause it is no doubt declared that the trustees shall not be answerable for "insufficiency of securities." But that surely means "insufficiency of securities" which, when they were taken, had reasonable consideration at the hands of the trustees. As to the other words of the immunity clause, I do not think they can be held to cover the case of taking such a security as was accepted with so little care or consideration in the circumstances already stated.

I am therefore of opinion with Lord Mure that the pursuers are entitled to succeed in this case against Mr Meek—of course subject to this, that so far as Mr and Mrs Rae are concerned, I should reserve any question of liability to them. My strong impression is that there can be no liability to them, and no right on the part of either of them to take any advantage of the money to be paid to the trustees inasmuch as they took the security just as Mr Meek did. Subject to that reservation, I am of opinion that Mr Meek is responsible.

Lord Young.—I think it has been the practice of this Court, and the practice of the Court is the law of the Court, when properly appealed to, to take a beneficent charge of trust interests—I mean interests which are committed to the charge of trustees—of any property in the hands of trustees, and out of the hands of the parties really interested. The case before us is one in which a trust-estate is competently or incompetently brought before the notice of the Court. It is averred and established to the satisfaction of, I think, all your Lordships who have spoken, that this trust-estate has suffered, in the meantime at least, a great loss—a loss to the extent of the whole of it. This trust-estate consists of a capital sum of £4500, and for some years that sum has had no existence. The parties having an interest in that sum come into Court and tell the Court that it has been lost. The action is at the instance of the ultimate fiars. I do not stop at this moment to notice the contingency to which your Lordship referred, and which you quite accurately stated. The right of these fiars, although subject to that contingency, is nevertheless an existing right. They bring an action into Court. They bring into Court in connection with that loss of the trust-fund—its disappearance out of the hands of the trustees—the trustees and the law-agent who was employed by them in that business which led to the loss which they allege. The action is held to be quite well founded. All of your Lordships who have delivered judgment are of opinion that it is a competent action as directed against the trustees. There is therefore nothing in the contingency affecting their right which prevents them in your Lordships' opinion directing their action against the trustees. It is competently directed against them, and in the opinion of two of your Lordships it is well founded against them. I agree with all of you in thinking that the action is competent by these beneficiaries against the trustees.

But I differ from those of you who think that the action is well founded against the trustees. I am of opinion with your Lordship in the chair, and with the Lord Justice-Clerk, that the action is not well founded against the trustees. Only one of the trustees has appeared. Of the other three, two are the parents of the pursuers, and the third trustee is their uncle. These three other trustees have not appeared. But in examining into this trust matter, I take them all into account. I do not think they are in any different position from Mr Meek in this question. I think Mr Meek is not answerable. I do not go upon the protection clause. I go on the fact that he gave his attention to the matter, and consulted and acted on the best—what he thought the best—advice—the advice of the family agent, who was quite properly employed by the trustees in this business. Upon that ground I think the trustees are not answerable. I do not go on the indemnity clause, for which, I think, there would be a great deal to be said but for the decisions. The decisions are very much in the way. In many, almost in all, of the cases in which liability has been held to attach to trustees for neglect, there was an indemnity clause much in the terms of the indemnity clause here, and in the argument in favour of applying that indemnity in favour of the trustees it was always urged that there was an exemption for neglect. Still although there was exemption for neglect, neglect was charged; exemption for error, well error was charged, and under the argument it was urged there was exemption for that. Then as to insufficiency of security, why, the whole case was insufficiency of security whereby money had been lost. The trustees would say as regards that, "I am protected against liability for that." All that has been disregarded in the past decisions of the Court in this country and in England also. Therefore I do not proceed on that protecting clause. I proceed on the other ground. I am of opinion that the trustees here did not incur liability for the loss, because they took the proper course of consulting and acting upon the advice of the family agent in the matter. They put the matter into the hands of the family agent, who undertook the business.

Then, is the action properly directed against the family agent? If he incurred no liability, if his conduct led to no responsibility on his part, of course there is an end of the matter. Nobody can sue him. He performed his contract. But one can hardly say, after the language that has been used, that he performed the duties under his contract in such a manner as to avoid liability for the consequences. I understood your Lordship in the chair to desire to avoid deciding whether he incurred liability or not, and to put the judgment on the ground that he is not liable to the pursuers of this action in this action. I understand that to be the opinion of Lord Moncreiff also. On the other hand, two of your Lordships are for deciding the question of liability, and in the judgment of two of your Lordships there is no liability. In my opinion there is liability, and liability which may be enforced in this action. This action is in no sense an action of damages. It is no more an action of damages against the law-agent than it is an action of damages against the trustees. If it had been an action of damages, the pursuers would have asked that money should be paid into their pockets. That is an action of damages. I never saw an action of damages with any other conclusion than one for payment to the pursuer. I could have well understood such an answer to that as this—"Why, you have suffered no damage. You may never suffer any damage. Your right is contingent, and may never become absolute, or it may become absolute so long hereafter that prosperity may have returned to this part of Glasgow, and everything may have become right by that time." But this is in no sense an action of damages. And I should, besides, be very sorry to see the ends of justice frustrated on a mere question of form of process.

I will begin by assuming liability in order to deal with the views presented by your Lordship from which I dissent. What, I should ask, is the consequence, if there is liability, which I now assume? Let me put a clear case of liability by the agent employed by trustees. He takes a bad title. That is a clear case for liability. There is not a good title to the property over which he lends the trust money. He is therefore liable. What is his liability? Liability in damages? That is not the language which one would employ, although I think if one called it damages that would not affect the result. But that is not accurate language. It does not express the true view of the matter. The liability which an agent incurs in such a way to an individual client is not liability in damages. It is liability to restore the money. The agent does not say—"You are to take the bad article I have given you, and I will make up the deficiency, or any loss that may accrue to you. I will pay you damages." That is not what would be said. What would be said by the injured party would be this —"No, you give me back the money which you had out of my hands, and take my security to yourself." So that it is not damages in any sense. But call it what you will, the liability is to pay the amount of money back into the hands of the client, or, in such a case as the present, into the hands of the trustees. That is the liability. Is it doubtful that if under a contract of employment by trustees to invest the money the agent took a bad title, which I am putting as a specimen case of incurring liability under that employment, the agent's obligation would be to pay the money back into the hands of the trustees—in this case the £4500? That is just the conclusion of this action—that the agent must pay into the hands of the trustees the amount of money that has been lost to the estate for the benefit of whom it may concern. It is ludicrous to speak of it as an action of damages at the instance of beneficiaries who may never receive a sixpence of the money. Their conclusion simply is that this agent shall pay back into the hands of the trustees the money which through his misconduct has been lost. And why, if that misconduct is established, shall that not be? And how shall it be done? Liability is to be enforced somehow. If not in this action, how is it to be done? It is suggested that an application should be made to the Court to appoint a judicial factor, or to compel the trustees to bring an action in their own name against the agent. Is not that the idlest matter of form, merely incurring useless expense and wasting time? Are the facts not all before us? Can we not judge upon these facts whether there is liability or not? Is there any other remedy asked here than would be asked in an action at the instance of the judicial factor or the trustees? There is only the one remedy, and that is what is asked for here. Then why not consider the matter in this action? All the questions connected with this trust are here before us. All the parties who can be interested in those questions are here also—the trustees, the beneficiaries, and the law-agent. There is nobody who has a vestige of interest in those questions who is not before us. The only conclusion which would result from establishing liability is the conclusion which is directed against the defenders in this action. Cannot the question of liability be tried in this action with perfect safety to the legitimate interests of everybody concerned? It certainly can be tried with perfect safety to the legitimate interests of the trustees;

why then can it not be tried with perfect safety to the interests of the law-agent? What risk would he run? How would he be prejudiced by defending his conduct in this action? I put that question repeatedly and got no answer. There is no answer. The agent is exposed to no risk, and there is no danger whatever to his legitimate interests, which are perfectly protected. I think, therefore, on the assumption of liability being established, that we should give effect to the result in this action.

I now come to the question of liability. What was the nature of the investment which was here made? I noted how your Lordship characterised it. Your Lordship said it was very bad—so bad that there was not a word to be said in its favour. Lord Mure characterised it as excessively bad. He used language of condemnation which Lord Shand rendered as "bad as bad could be." That was work done under a contract of employment, and the result is the loss of money. Are we to determine that an agent when he is employed to invest trust money incurs no liability for advising and carrying out an investment in favour of which there is not a word to be said, which is "excessively bad," "as bad as bad can be," and which resulted in the loss of money? Are we to decide that there is no liability incurred by him unless there is an error in the conveyancing? I am not prepared to affirm that. Lord Mure put it tersely when he said that if we decided otherwise it would be making the law-agent guarantee the security, and his fee will not cover that. But two of your Lordships—and Lord Mure is one of them—think that without any fee Mr Meek is to guarantee the security. I do not think it is a case of guaranteeing the security at all. I think it was a case of avoiding making an investment which was so bad that "there is not a word to be said in its favour," which is "as bad as bad can be," and which led to the loss of money,—of the whole of the estate which might come to belong to these beneficiaries. Two of your Lordships would, I think, be of that opinion if it is a case of guarantee at all. For you think Mr Meek is liable. I do not think that that is the law at all, and I should not hold a law-agent responsible upon the ground of guaranteeing a security, but on the ground that the work that he did is capable of being judicially characterised by the language to which I have referred as being used by your Lordships.

Upon these grounds my opinion is that the trustee Mr Meek ought to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, but that the action ought to be sustained at the instance of the present pursuers against the law-agent, not for the purpose or to the effect of putting a shilling of money into the pockets of the pursuers or anyone else, but merely for the purpose of making the law-agent do the duties which the Court is at the instance of such parties accustomed to exact—that is, to order the trust-estate to be restored—the money which has been lost through the misconduct of anyone connected with it against whom liability has been established. In this case the money would be put into the hands of the trustees, or we might appoint an officer to receive it, and to administer it for behoof of those whom it might concern.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—On the question of the liability of the agent, I concur with your Lordship. As regards the liability of the trustees, I concur with Lord Mure and Lord Shand.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair on both points.

Entail—Money held under trust to purchase and entail lands—Aberdeen Act, 5 Geo. IV. c. 87.—An heir of entail in possession executed a bond of provision in virtue of the powers contained in the Aberdeen Act, providing to his younger children a sum equal to three years' rent of his entailed estates. In addition to the lands under the entail he held also certain sums of money invested under a trust for the purchase of additional lands to be entailed in the same way, or to be applied in payment of children's provisions charged on the entailed estate, in regard to which sums he had "the same powers" as if the money had been already applied in the purchase of such lands. Held that the interest of these sums fell to be included with the rent of the entailed estate in calculating the amount due to the younger children under the bond of provision.

Entail—Power of entailer—Aberdeen Act, 5 Geo. IV. c. 87, sec. 4—Division of amount of younger children's provisions.—An heir of entail executed a bond of provision on the narrative of the Aberdeen Act, whereby he provided £10,000, calculated to be the amount of three years' rents of his entailed estate, to his second son, or in the event of that being held beyond his powers, £9000 to his second son, £600 to his third son, and £400 to his fourth son; or in the event of its being held beyond his powers to give the whole or an unequal portion to his second son, then he provided £10,000 to his whole younger children, five in number, equally. Held, by a majority of the whole Court (Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Mure, Shand, Rutherfurd Clark, Adam, Kinnear, and M'Laren), that it was within the powers of the granter to provide the whole amount of the three years' rents to the second son.

Lord Fraser and Lord Trayner held that the second alternative provision of £9000 to the second son, £600 to the third, and £400 to the fourth should receive effect.

Lord Young and Lord Lee held that under the statute the provision to one child could not exceed one year's free rent, and therefore that the third mode of provision, viz., in favour of the younger children equally, was the only one which could receive effect.

Entail—Patronage compensation—Church Patronage Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 82), sec. 4.—An heir of entail in possession claimed compensation for the value of the patronage of a parish church. He died after receiving one of the four equal statutory instalments. Held, on a construction of the Patronage Act, 1874, sec. 4, that the heir succeeding to the entailed estates had no right to any part of the patronage compensation, and that the same was personal to the deceased heir in possession who claimed it, and therefore fell to his executor.

* After the questions in which the first party had an interest were determined, Mr Thomson and Mr Gillespie represented the fourth and fifth parties and Mr Jameson the third party.

WILLIAM PATERSON of Montgomerie died on 20th October 1886, and was succeeded in the entailed estates by his eldest son, Robert Paterson Paterson.

In January 1887 a special case was presented by the said Robert Paterson Paterson, first party, by the trustees and executors of the deceased William Paterson, second parties, by William Alexander Orr Paterson, the deceased's second son, third party, by Charles Orr Paterson and Henry Edwin Paterson, the deceased's third and fourth sons, fourth parties, and by Mrs Ann Paterson or Sadlier and Mrs Mary Paterson or Campbell, the deceased's daughters, fifth parties.

Three questions were put,—(1) Whether the interest of certain sums of money invested in names of trustees in the Funded Debt of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company "fell to be included in calculating the amount due under" a bond of provision to younger children executed by the late William Paterson? (2) As to the respective rights of the younger children under the said bond of provision; and (3) Who was entitled to the several instalments of patronage compensation money to which the deceased had been found entitled under the Church Patronage Act, 1874?

The first and third questions were disposed of by the Second Division, and the second question was, after argument, directed to be laid before the whole Court—(infra, p. 1068).

The first question arose in the following circumstances:—William Paterson, formerly attorney-at-law in Jamaica, by his settlement, dated 29th July 1829, directed his trustees to employ a portion of his estate in the purchase of lands to be entailed upon William Paterson, afterwards called William Paterson of Montgomerie, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, upon a certain series of heirs. After his death they, by disposition and deed of entail dated in 1849, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies in 1850, entailed the estate of Montgomerie, which they had acquired, upon William Paterson, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, upon a certain succession of heirs, "whom all failing, then to the Provost and Magistrates of Kilmarnock and the three ministers of the Low and High Churches in the said town for the time being, and the successors in office of the said Provost, Bailies, and ministers respectively, for ever free of the whole fetters of the entail, but inalienably and upon trust nevertheless to and for the special ends, intents, and purposes after specified."

There remained after the trustees had purchased and entailed Montgomerie a portion amounting to £1080 of the sum to be laid out in purchasing and entailing lands. This sum the trustees deposited in bank.

In 1871 the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company took under statutory powers a portion of the entailed estate, and deposited in bank the compensation money, a sum of £3722, 5s. 6d.

In 1872 William Paterson of Montgomerie presented a petition for warrant to uplift from bank and acquire in fee-simple these two sums, and to this petition he obtained the consent of his three eldest sons Robert Paterson Paterson, William Alexander Orr Paterson, and Charles Orr Paterson, on the conditions contained in an agreement with them dated in that year, by which he bound himself on receiving payment of the said sums of money to deposit them in bank in name of himself and his three eldest sons, and his son-in-law Mr N. C. Campbell, as trustees to hold the money meantime in trust, on investments of a specified description until a suitable opportunity should arise for the purchase of lands, and then to purchase such lands, and to execute an entail of the lands to be purchased therewith "in favour of the heir of entail in possession of the estate of Montgomerie, and the other heirs in succession, all in terms of the entail of the estate of Montgomerie; but excluding the provost, bailies, and ministers of the town of Kilmarnock from any interest therein or right of devolution on failure of the heirs of entail; declaring however that the trustees shall be entitled, if they think proper, to apply the said sums, or any portion thereof, in payment pro tanto of children's provisions charged upon the rents or fee of the estate of Montgomerie. Until the said sums shall be applied in the purchase of land to be entailed, or in payment of children's provisions, the interest or dividends accruing thereon, to be paid by the trustees to the heir in possession of the estate of Montgomerie, and declaring that the heir of entail in possession of the estate of Montgomerie shall have the same powers in regard to the above-mentioned sums that he would have had if they had been invested in the purchase of lands, and entailed in terms of the Montgomerie entail, according to the present law, or any future Act that may be passed, affecting entails." In this petition the said William Paterson obtained decree in 1872.

The money (£4800) was invested by the trustees under this trust in funded debt of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, until a suitable opportunity for the purchase of lands should arise.

In 1877 the trustees of William Paterson of Jamaica deposited in bank a sum of £3026, being the one-half of the residue of the truster's estate directed to be laid out in purchasing lands to be settled on the heirs entitled to succeed to the Montgomerie estates.

In 1878 William Paterson of Montgomerie presented a petition to acquire in fee-simple this sum of £3026, and he obtained decree in this petition also, having obtained the consent of his three eldest sons on the conditions of an agreement that he should deposit the sum, when warrant should be obtained, in bank in names of him and them to be invested in the meantime in certain investments, and held for the purchase of lands to be added to the Montgomerie estate, and entailed in terms of the Montgomerie entail. The parties bound themselves to execute, when necessary, a formal deed of agreement precisely the same as that with regard to the other sums already acquired in fee-simple, and invested as above explained, "it being always understood that until the said sum is invested in land, and entailed, the heir of entail in possession of the estate of Montgomerie shall have the same control over the said sum and interest thereon as he would have had over the lands and rentals to be purchased and entailed."

This money, after deducting the expense of disentailing, amounted to £2930, and, like the other two sums, was invested in funded debt of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company.

A suitable opportunity to acquire lands not having occurred, the moneys still remained so invested down to the date of this special case.

On 4th February 1884 William Paterson of Montgomerie executed a bond of provision in favour of younger children which proceeded on the narrative that the powers given him by the deed of entail of providing for his younger children were inadequate, and that by the Act 5 Geo. IV. c. 87, it is enacted "that it shall and may be lawful to the heir of entail in possession to grant bonds of provision or obligations, binding the succeeding heirs of entail in payment out of the rents or proceeds of the same to the lawful child or children of the person granting such bonds or obligations who shall not succeed to such entailed estate of such sum or sums . . . as to him or her shall seem fit: Provided always that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following of the free yearly value of the said entailed lands and estate,— . . . . that is to say, for one child one year's free rent or value, for two children two years' free rent or value, and for three or more children three years' free rent or value in the whole. . . ." The granter then proceeded to make alternative provisions for younger children to the amount of £10,000, providing that if that sum should be found to exceed three years' free rent or value of said entailed estate, the provision should be restricted. The terms of the bond are more fully given infra (p. 1068) on reporting the second question. It is sufficient to state here that the bond contained no reference to the funds held under trust above mentioned, or to the trust-deeds.

The amount of three years' free rent of the estate, along with the interest of the funds above mentioned, amounted to £9451, 6s. 3d.

Robert Paterson Paterson, as heir of entail, maintained that the amount of younger children's provisions created by the bond of provision was limited to three years' rent of the entailed lands of Montgomerie, viz., £8523, 14s. 3d.; that his father, as preceding heir in possession, had no power to include within it three years' interest of the invested money, and that he did not intend to include it, even if he had had the power.

On the other hand, William Alexander Orr Paterson and the other younger children maintained that three years' interest of the money invested in trust till land should be purchased was to be added to the £8523, 14s. 3d., making in all £9451, 6s. 3d., their father having intended, and having been entitled, to deal with that interest in the bond of provision.

The first question was, Does the interest of the foresaid sums of £4800 and £2930 . . . fall to be included in calculating the amount due under the bond of provision?

The third question arose as to sums of compensation paid and payable under the Church Patronage Act, 1874, in respect of the patronage of the parish of Tarbolton, which had been included in the entail of Montgomerie. William Paterson of Montgomerie had presented a petition to the Sheriff of Ayrshire to have the compensation due to him in respect of the operation of the Act determined, and the Sheriff had found, on 16th March 1875, that he was entitled to compensation equal to one year's stipend taken at £383, 14s. 5½d., on the occurrence of a vacancy, by four equal instalments out of the first four years' stipend.*

A vacancy occurred in 1884, and Mr Paterson got payment of the first instalment, and his trustees and executors got the second instalment. A question arose whether Robert Paterson Paterson, as heir of entail, was entitled to the instalments as a surrogatum for part of the entailed estate. He maintained that he was, and that his father's executors had no claim to the instalments which they had received or which were still to be received.

The executors maintained that the patronage compensation was personal to the patron claiming it, and that they were not liable to refund the instalments thereof which had been received, and were entitled to those still unpaid.

* By the 4th section of the Church Patronage (Scotland) Act, 1874, it is enacted that "in all cases in which the patronage of a parish is held either solely or jointly by a private patron, or any guardian or trustee on his behalf, it shall be lawful for him, or for such guardian or trustee, at any time within six months after the passing of this Act, to present a petition to the Sheriff of the county (and when the parish is partly in two or more counties, the petition may be presented to the Sheriff of any one of such counties), praying him to determine the compensation to be paid to such patron in respect of the operation of this Act; but it shall not be incumbent on any such patron, or upon any guardian or trustee for such patron, whether the patronage is held upon a fee-simple title or under a deed of entail, or other limited title, to present such petition; and if no such petition shall be presented within the said period, it shall be held and taken that the claim for such compensation has been renounced, and no claim therefor shall afterwards be competent in any manner of way."

Paterson v. Paterson.

Argued for the first party;—As to the first question. The interest of the money referred to in this question could not be reckoned as falling within the bond of provision for two reasons,—(1) Because the granter of the bond did not intend that it should, and (2) because the bond was not capable of including it. It was a bond granted under the Aberdeen Act, which gave an heir power to bind his entailed estate, but not to go further and bind money held in the position of the money in question. The granter said in the bond that the subject affected by it was to be three years' free rent or value of the "said entailed estate"—that was the entailed estate of Montgomerie, of which in the narrative he described himself as heir of entail in possession. Now, the money here in question was not part of that estate in a strict sense, nor yet in the sense of being subject to the same destination, for in the entail of Montgomerie existing when, the bond was made the provost, bailies, and ministers of Kilmarnock were called at the end of the destination as heirs of entail, whereas the trust under which the money was invested directed that any entail of lands to be bought with it should be one "excluding the provost, bailies, and ministers of the town of Kilmarnock from any interest therein or right of devolution on failure of the heirs of entail." Again, the trustees under the trust to entail were not bound to purchase lands to be entailed, but were "entitled, if they think proper, to apply the said sums, or any portion thereof, in payment pro tanto of children's provisions charged upon the rents or fee of the estate of Montgomerie." It was impossible, in view of this alternative power of application, to say that the money was just in the same position as the entailed estate. These considerations, which depended on matters which were all known to the granter, shewed that he did not intend the money in question to fall under the bond. (2) On the second point he maintained that under the Aberdeen Act itself it was clear that the bond of provision could only apply to lands in the entail. It was argued that sections 26 and 27 of the Rutherfurd Act extended the powers of the heir in possession to money in trust to be entailed, dealing with it as if it were entailed, and that section 8 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1868,* extended the Aberdeen Act to trusts for entails to be executed, but the answer was that already given on the first point, that the trustees were here under no necessity to buy land and entail it at all, if they preferred to pay off children's provisions. In Callander v. Callander[1] an heir who had power under the entail to make provisions for younger children "only by way of infeftment and locality, or by assignation to the rents," made provisions for them by binding the next heir to pay to trustees a capital sum, and in security of it to infeft them in the whole estate. The Court, though the deed declared that if it should be found to exceed the granter's power it should be reduced quoad excessum or the form varied in compliance with the meaning of the entail, refused to reform it, and held it invalid under the entail, and incapable of being sustained under the Aberdeen Act because it bore to be in exercise of the power given by the entail. So, in the earlier case of Dickson,[1] where it was held that a bond which had been granted with reference to the deed of entail could not be founded on as a provision under the Aberdeen Act, Lord Brougham said, with respect to the exercise of powers under the Aberdeen Act, that "it is not necessary to set forth in an instrument executing a power that it has been framed in execution of that power, . . . but upon a question as to two powers or faculties, one of them being expressly stated by the party to be the one under which he executes it, I know of no case in which the other power, unthought of by him, had been held to validate the instrument." Both cases were strongly in favour of the first party.

* This section enacts, inter alia, that the Montgomery Act (10 Geo. III. c. 51) and the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. c. 87) "shall from and after the passing of this Act be applicable to all entails, whether dated before or after 1st August 1848, and to all trusts of whatever date under which land is held for the purpose of being entailed, or by which money or other property, real or personal, is invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed; and the powers conferred by the said two last-mentioned Acts, or either of them, may be exercised with reference to such land, money, or property by the person who, if such land had been entailed in terms of the trust, would be the heir in possession of the entailed land and by the person who, if such money or other property had been invested in the purchase of land to be entailed, would be the heir in possession under the entail to be executed of such purchased land if such entail had been executed."

[1] May 21, 1869, 7 Macph. 777.

Argued for the first party on the third question;—The patronage of Tarbolton was included in the entail, and the compensation for it ought to be the heir's. The Patronage Act, 1874, did not direct the application of the money, but section 26 of the Rutherfurd Act provided what should be done with money derived from the disposal of part of an entailed estate, and gave the heir the same interest in it as in the land. The Patronage Act provided, section 4, that it should not be "incumbent" on a patron or trustee of a patron to present a petition for the fixing of compensation for loss of patronage—a provision not easily explained if the right was only personal and unconnected with the estate itself.

Argued for the second, third, fourth, and fifth parties on the first question;—The power was exercised in virtue of the Aberdeen Act. The agreement to put the money in trust shewed what was the estate over which the granter could under that Act give provisions to younger children. That was its proper function. The matter of his intention was very clear on a consideration of the figures in the deeds. Mr Paterson knew the rental of his own estate, the free rental of which, after proper deductions, was £2841, 4s. 9d., and three years of which was £8523, 14s. 3d., while three years' interest on the deposited money was £927, 12s., giving a total of £9451, 6s. 3d. Now, the provision he made under his powers was one of £10,000, to be restricted, if necessary, so as to bring it within his powers under the Act. It was clear that he wished to use all the powers he had, and it was not to be supposed he would wish to exclude the entailed money, but the contrary. The power given to the trustees in the trust of the money to pay off provisions only shewed the desire that was felt to keep the land and money together, and the reasonableness of calling both the entailed estates. The cases of Callander and Dickson, quoted by the other side, only shewed that where the heir had done what was inconsistent with his powers it could not receive effect to any extent. The supposed difference between the destination in the entail of the land and in the entail to be made did not really exist. The provost and bailies and ministers of Kilmarnock in the former were not heirs of entail but only in the position of heirs whatsoever at the end of a destination in an entail. But however that might be, the agreement to place the money in trust to be entailed put the money in the same position as entailed estate.

On the third question. The compensation for patronage was truly personal. It might be claimed or not by the patron who was in life during the six months in which the claim could competently be made.

Paterson v. Paterson.

If he chose to claim it he could do so, but it was just a debt payable by instalments.

At advising, on 20th July 1887, with regard to the first and third questions,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has given us a good deal of anxiety with regard to one of the questions put to us—that, namely, which involves a consideration of the 4th clause of the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. c. 87). We thought it advisable to consult with other members of the Court, and so an interlocutor was pronounced, appointing the case to be argued before ourselves with the assistance of three of our brethren of the First Division—I mean argued with reference to the second question. We have had the matter under consideration again, and have thought it essential to have the opinion of the whole Court, looking to the important nature of that question. We discharge the former order as regards that hearing, and will now appoint minutes of debate to be prepared and laid before the whole Court.

With regard to the first and third questions, however, we are prepared to give judgment.

The first relates to the interest of certain sums of £4800 and £2930 funded debt of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company. The question with regard to these two sums is, whether they fall to be taken into calculation in estimating the amount due under the bond of provision executed by the late William Paterson of Montgomerie as heir of entail of Montgomerie under the Aberdeen Act? I am of opinion that these sums, which were sums directed to be entailed, and which have been invested for the purpose of the purchase of land to be added to the entailed estate, are truly in this question under the Aberdeen Act. By the trust-deed it is declared that the heir of entail "shall have the same powers in regard to the above-mentioned sums that he would have had if they had been invested in the purchase of lands, and entailed in terms of the Montgomerie entail according to the present law, or any future Act that may be passed affecting entails." It seems clear therefore that it was in view to treat these sums as part of the entailed estate. The proceedings in regard to the matter are narrated in the special case, and I do not need to enter into them in detail, but it is quite clear what the conception was upon which the investments have been made. The provision seems to me to be perfectly clear—that until the sum is invested in the purchase of land the heir of entail in possession of Montgomerie shall have the same control over the sum, and the interest upon the sum, as he would have had in lands subject to the entail. It is said that Mr Paterson, who executed the bond under the Aberdeen Act, did not intend—or at all events had not duly carried out the intention—to charge those invested funds as part of the estate of Montgomerie. I am of opinion that it was totally unnecessary that he should do so, because they are part of the estate of Montgomerie, inasmuch as they fall under the same destination as the entailed lands, and the same provisions in regard to fetters affect them as affected the entailed lands. They can, in short, only be considered in the same way as the estate of Montgomerie would have been before this addition—for it truly was an addition—was made to it.

That is the general view I take of the investments. It is consistent with practice and with principle. There are provisions in the Entail Acts—in the Rutherfurd Act and the subsequent Acts—in regard to money destined to be entailed. We know what these provisions are, and I think that no other result than what I have indicated would be consistent with the principles upon which such investments have hitherto been dealt with.

The third question is one of considerable interest—"Who is entitled to the several instalments of patronage compensation money?" I have formed a clear opinion upon this question, and that opinion is, that the instalments of the price of the patronage of Tarbolton, and in respect of which certain payments of compensation had become due under the Patronage Act, do not form part of the entailed estate, and that there was no obligation on the heir of entail to invest them or purchase with them land to be entailed, and that the subsequent heirs of entail had no interest in them whatever. I gather that not only from the nature of the fund itself and the source of it, but I gather it from the words also of the Church Patronage Act of 1874. It is enacted there that "in all cases in which the patronage of a parish is held either solely or jointly by a private patron, or guardian or trustee on his behalf, it shall be lawful for him, within six months after the passing of this Act, to present a petition to the Sheriff of the county, praying him to determine the compensation"; and then it says that "it shall not be incumbent on any such patron, or upon any guardian or trustee for such patron, whether the patronage is held upon a fee-simple title or under a deed of entail, or other limited title, to present such petition; and if no such petition shall be presented within the said period, it shall be held and taken that the claim for such compensation has been renounced, and no claim therefor shall afterwards be competent in any manner of way." I think it is impossible to contend that the fund was not placed entirely in the discretion of the heir in possession at the date of the passing of the Act, or that it was subject to any fetters at all, or creates any jus crediti whatever in the substitute heirs under the destination. I think the heir in possession could at his pleasure renounce the payment altogether, and the mere omission to present a petition within six months is, in my opinion, conclusive once and for all that no such payment was to be made. Therefore I cannot look upon that as a condition of things in favour of the substitute heirs of entail, or as being in any degree affected by the fetters under which the estate is held. Mr Paterson was the patron; he was entitled to present under the Act; and he was entitled to decline to receive compensation both for himself and all that were to succeed to him.

That, generally, is the view that I take upon this matter. The compensation does not come in place of any part of the entailed estate, but is merely to be regarded as a payment made to the party entitled to the next presentation by way of succedaneum to himself personally. I think it goes to the executors. Although the instalments are postponed I do not think that makes any difference on the right of the heir in possession at the passing of the Act. I think the instalments vested in him at that date, and that consequently his executors are now in right of them.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I. I think the first question ought to be answered in the affirmative. I have felt no difficulty in coming to this conclusion. By the trust-deed, a portion of which is quoted in article 6 of the special case, it is declared that the heir of entail in the possession of the estate of Montgomerie

"shall have the same powers in regard to the above-mentioned sums that he would have had if they had been invested in the purchase of lands, and entailed in terms of the Montgomerie entail according to the present law, or any future Act that may be passed affecting entails." The effect of this declaration was, as I think, to bring the money in question as much within the powers conferred by the Aberdeen Act as if the lands for the acquisition of which it was held had been actually acquired and had been in possession of the heir of entail. The power to be exercised is not a power conferred by the trust-deed, for according to my reading all that is thereby done is to assimilate the interest of the money to the rent of the land intended to be bought. The power to be exercised, and which was exercised, was that conferred by the Aberdeen Act.

II. The executors of the last heir of entail, who was the party by whom the petition was presented to the Sheriff asking that the value of the patronage of Tarbolton should be fixed under the Church (Scotland) Patronage Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 82), are the parties who in my opinion are entitled to the unpaid instalments of the patronage compensation money which was fixed by the Sheriff under the powers conferred by the said statute. They are the persons who are now in his right. The right of patronage by the passing of the Act was extinguished, and no longer formed a portion of the entailed estate. There is nothing therefore to which the present heir of entail as such may lay claim, because his rights are limited to property which is within the entail. More than that, the claim of this heir of entail is discountenanced by this consideration, that were he to get the money he would not get it as part of the entailed estate, because he would get it, not to keep for heirs of entail, but to spend it as his own money. Whoever shall succeed in a petition for patronage compensation will get what is absolutely his own, and here those entitled to the compensation money, so far as unpaid, are the heirs in mobilibus of the last heir in possession.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—" The Lords . . . answer the first question in the affirmative . . . answer the third question to the effect that the parties of the second part are entitled to the several instalments of the right of patronage of the parish of Tarbolton: In respect of the importance of the second question appoint the parties to prepare minutes of debate to be . . . . boxed . . . to the Judges of the whole Court for their opinion thereon."

The second question, which was remitted for the opinion of the whole Court, arose on the following clauses in the bond of provision executed by the late William Paterson under the powers conferred by the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. c. 87),—" Seeing that I am now desirous of granting, by virtue of the powers conferred on heirs of entail by the said statute, a suitable provision to my second son, William Alexander Orr Paterson, not succeeding to the said entailed estate, and that I have made what I considered suitable provision otherwise for my other younger sons, Charles Orr Paterson and Henry Edmund Paterson, and also for my two daughters, Mrs Ann Paterson or Sadlier, and Mrs Mary Paterson or Campbell, therefore I do hereby, in virtue of the foresaid powers contained in the said Statute of 5 Geo. IV. chap. 87, and the subsequent Entail Statutes, and subject to the declarations and restrictions after mentioned, bind and oblige myself, and the heirs of entail succeeding to the foresaid estate of Montgomerie, to content and pay to my said son, William Alexander Orr Paterson, the sum of £10,000 sterling, payable one year after my death, with a fifth part more of penalty in case of failure, and the interest of the said sum at the rate of four per centum from the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death to the foresaid term of payment, and thereafter during the not-payment thereof. But in the event of its being found to be in excess of my powers to provide the whole of said sum to my said son, William Alexander Orr Paterson (but only in that event), I bind and oblige myself, and the heir of entail succeeding to the foresaid estate of Montgomerie, to content and pay to and among the said William Alexander Orr Paterson, Charles Orr Paterson, and Henry Edmund Paterson, the said sum of £10,000 sterling, payable one year after my death, with a fifth part more of penalty in case of failure, and the interest of the said sum at the rate of four per centum from the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death, to the foresaid term of payment, and thereafter during the not-payment thereof, and that in the proportion following—videlicet: To my son William Alexander Orr Paterson, the sum of £9000 sterling; to my son Charles Orr Paterson, the sum of £600 sterling; and to my son Henry Edmund Paterson, the sum of £400 sterling. Or otherwise, and in the event of its being found to be in excess of my powers either to provide the whole of said sum to my son William Alexander Orr Paterson or to apportion it among my said three sons in manner before mentioned (but in that event only), then to content and pay the said sum of £10,000 sterling, among the said William Alexander Orr Paterson, Charles Orr Paterson, and Henry Edmund Paterson, and Mrs Ann Paterson or Sadlier, and Mrs Mary Paterson or Campbell, in equal proportion, payable also at the term, and with the interest and penalty before provided. Providing also, that if the sum above settled on my said son William Alexander Orr Paterson, or alternatively, in either of the events above mentioned, on my said three sons, or on my said three sons and two daughters, shall be found to exceed three years' free rent or value of said entailed estate, as the amount of the said free rents and values shall be ascertained in the manner pointed out by the said statute, then the said sum or sums, as the case may be, shall be and are hereby proportionally restricted so as to be consistent with the powers conferred by said statute."

The question was,—"Who is the party entitled to the sum due under the said bond of provision—(a) The said third party to the whole amount; (b) The said third party and his brothers, Charles Orr Paterson and Henry Edmund Paterson, in the proportion stated; or (c) The whole younger children equally?"

Argued for the third party, William Alexander Orr Paterson;—On a sound construction of the Aberdeen Act * the granter of a bond under

* The Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. cap. 87), sec. 4,—"And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful to the heir of entail in possession of any such entailed estate as aforesaid to grant bonds of provision or obligations, binding the succeeding heirs of entail in payment out of the rents or proceeds of the same to the lawful child or lawful children of the person granting such bonds or obligations, who shall not succeed to such entailed estate, of such sum or sums of money, bearing interest from the granter's death, as to him or her shall seem fit: Provided always, that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following of the free yearly rents or free yearly value of the whole of the said entailed lands and estates after deducting the public burdens, liferent provisions, including those to wives or husbands, authorised to be granted by this Act, the yearly interest of debts and provisions, and the

it might settle a provision on one or more of his younger children as he saw fit. Its object was to empower the heir in possession to provide for children not succeeding to the estate, and it was an absolute power to do so as to the granter "shall seem fit." The heir who did succeed had no right to interfere so long as the burden did not exceed the power. So long as there were three younger children his predecessor's right was absolute. Nor was he obliged to exercise the right in any particular way, or indeed to exercise it at all. Having three younger children he might provide for none of them out of the estate, or for one only, or for two only. The child or children omitted had no right to interfere any more than the child who took the estate. It was obvious that there were good reasons for the Legislature not interfering with the father's discretion. He might have made ample provisions from other funds, or, as in the Airlie case,[1] have other entailed estates, and provided for separate children out of separate estates. Since then the children had no jus crediti to receive any portion under the Aberdeen Act, they had no title to object if the father used his discretion and exercised his power to the fullest extent in favour of one child. The word "for" in the clause "for one child one year's free rent," and so on, was construed by the other parties as equivalent to the word "to" or "in favour of," but the clause could not be so read. It was "the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following . . . that is to say, for one child one year's free rent," &c. The enacting clause gave the heir in possession the power, and the proviso specifying the extent to which the estate might be burdened was merely meant in a question with the next heir only, to make the burden proportional, up to a certain point, to the number of younger children the heir in possession might have. Assuming that in order to justify a provision of three years' free rent it was necessary that three children be benefited, that was done by the alternative clause which gave to William £9000, to Charles £600, and to Henry £400, an apportionment admitted not to be unfair if unequal division were allowed. But it was said that equal division must be made if three years' rental were dealt with at all. The contention was not in itself reasonable, nor in accordance with practice.[2]

Even if it had been a vested right in the younger children, which was not maintained on the other side, the Apportionment Act[1] would have applied, and the total exclusion of any of the objects of the power would not invalidate the appointment. That Act applied to Scotland,[2] and though the preamble of it referred to "deeds, wills, and other instruments" the enacting words were perfectly general.

II. The matter had been determined by decision, and the view of the third party frequently assumed to be law by the Court. In the case of Antrobus[3] the point really left open was as to the extent to which the estate might be burdened, and the point decided was that the defender, the heir in possession, was bound to grant deeds to the extent allowed by the Aberdeen Act, although there might be no fund left for provision for his younger children other than the object of the provision. The case had since been regarded as authority for the proposition that as the father was not bound to exercise the powers vested in him in favour of his younger children, "he was also enabled to exercise that power in favour of one or more as he thought fit."[4] The power of the heir of entail to favour one or more of the children as he thought fit was assumed in the case of Breadalbane's Trustees.[5] In the case of Strathallan,[6] the judgment of the Court, affirmed by the House of Lords, involved the soundness of this contention. In Grierson's case[7] a bond of provision under the Aberdeen Act providing to four of the granter's numerous younger children, "and the survivors and survivor of them" was held to be a bond in the exact terms of the statute. Lastly, in the case of Campbell,[8] Lord President M'Neill and Lord Ardmillan (Ordinary) were of opinion that the granter, if he chose to exercise his statutory powers and provide the funds "was under no obligation as to the mode in which he was to divide them." These authorities, even apart from the argument on principle, were conclusive in the third party's favour.

Argued for the fourth and fifth parties;—I. The statute by its fourth and fifth clauses authorised an equal division among the children who should not succeed to the entailed estate, and no other division. The evil the statute was intended to remedy was the inability of proprietors of entailed estates to make proper provisions for their younger children. It must be construed in a liberal manner to effect its purposes of remedying that evil. In so far, however, as it imposed a burden on heirs of entail under which they did not previously lie, it must receive a strict construction. The provision for William Orr Paterson, being "one child," could not exceed one year's free rent, for the statute "provided always that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed

. . . for one child one year's free rent." Supposing the father had not gone on to make further provisions, and the question had been between William and the heir of entail, his elder brother, could the latter have been so burdened? He would have relied on the terms of the statute as shewing that he could not be bound to allow William to carry off more than one year's free rent of the estate. As it happened, in consequence of the alternative provisions of this particular deed, the heir of entail had no interest in the question; but if William's contention were sustained, the decision must apply to a case in which the heir and a younger child who had been given the whole of the younger children's provisions were the sole parties. The statute was intended to enable a father to encroach on the entailed estate for the benefit of the younger children, and any pretended exercise of its powers, except for their direct and personal benefit could not receive effect.[1] The extent of the encroachment was regulated by the number of those to be provided for, a line being drawn at the third child to prevent an unreasonable encroachment on the heir's rights. But if those for whose benefit alone the power was given did not receive the benefit of its exercise, that exercise was not within the statute at all. The second or the third child could not, surely, be entitled to a larger provision because he had several brothers and sisters. It had always been a canon of interpretation of the statute that the benefit of the younger children themselves must be directly provided for. Thus, a provision to grandchildren was not within it. So also in the Breadalbane case the Court held a bond which professed to be under the Act, but which made a provision not directly for the younger child herself, but only for her in liferent, the fee passing to her children or, in certain events, to strangers, was ineffectual to bind the heirs of entail.

The alleged authority[2] founded on by the other side consisted merely of obiter dicta. The question had never been directly raised and decided. The question there was whether a provision of a liferent to children, with directions to invest the fee and entail it on a series of heirs, fell within the powers of the granter, and the subject of construction was not the Aberdeen Act, but the powers of a particular entail. The opinion of Lord Newton (Ordinary) in the case of Antrobus (9 S. 70) did indeed go as far as the contention on the other side could require. But the Inner-House did not countenance that opinion, and the interlocutor did not decide the point. The reasoning of Lord Newton was inconclusive. It was quite true, as his Lordship said, that the younger children had no jus crediti, that the father was not bound to give anything by an Aberdeen Act bond to them, or, if he gave them anything, to give all that the Act permitted. But notwithstanding that, it might well be and it was maintained, that he could not exercise his powers for any other object than the object of the statute—the making provision for the younger children. If he omitted in whole or in part to provide for one of them, to that extent he lost his power of burdening the heir, a power given to him by the law on the condition that he must exercise on certain objects. If he chose to provide for one younger child only, he must do so to the extent of one child's share only.

In Campbell's case,[3] Lord Ardmillan cited the case of Antrobus to shew that the father could apportion as he chose. But for the reasons already shewn that opinion was erroneous, and it was an opinion unnecessary to the decision, for in that case the amount of the provisions had already been ascertained and charged on the estate, and therefore could not be open to dispute. Nor was the point really raised in the case of Grierson,[1] where the question was whether the bond was within the statute as being a provision in favour of the child, or without it as being a provision in favour of her issue. The provision giving the whole sum to William was therefore ultra vires.

[3] Campbell v. Campbell, Dec. 13, 1860, 23 D. 159.

Further the division must be equal. Where a provision was made to all the members of a class and no rule of division was given, the rule was that the division must be equal, and the considerations already advanced favoured the application of this rule. The younger children were all equally unprovided for out of the entailed estate, and it was for their benefit that the power to make provision was given, there being no suggestion that one was to be better off than another.

If the division was to be equal—and that, it was submitted, was the effect of the statute—it was the granter's will that the whole of his five children should have shares. The granter was not bound indeed, as a condition of exercising his full powers, to give anything to the fourth and fifth younger children at all, for he was entitled to burden the heir with provisions to the extent of three years' rents if these were to be distributed among three children. But he had declared that he would only confine his bounty to his three sons if he had power to give them unequal provisions. This it had been shewn was beyond his power, and therefore the daughters must be admitted to a share.

II. Alternatively, if the amount was not to be equally divided, the father, who made provision of an amount equal to three years' rent, must divide that among three children at least, in such a fashion that none of them should have an illusory share. It was not maintained, if this was to be the rule of division, that the apportionment of £9000 to William, £600 to Charles, and £400 to Henry, was an unfair exercise of the power. The ground on which this alternative claim finally rested was the same as that asserted for the first alternative, viz., that to justify a provision of three years' rents three children at least must be benefited.

It could not be maintained that, given this power of appointment, then by virtue of the Act 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 37, the father had power to disappoint two of the persons who were within the power, and give the whole fund to one. The Act in question applied exclusively to powers conferred by "deeds, wills, and other instruments," and not to a statutory power, particularly if that power was conferred for the very purpose of favouring all the objects of it.

The following opinions were returned,—

Lord President, Lords Mure, Shand, Adam, and Kinnear.—We are of opinion that the third party is entitled to the entire sum contained in the bond of provision, assuming that sum to be not more than three years' rent.

The object of the fourth section of the Aberdeen Act is to relax the fetters of entail, for the purpose of enabling the heir in possession to provide for his younger children; and to the extent to which the fetters are so relaxed, the proprietor of an entailed estate is placed in the same position as if he were unlimited owner. He must exercise his powers in conformity with the conditions of the statute, because, except in so far as the statute relieves him, he is restricted by the fetters of the entail. But in construing these conditions, it is material to observe that the power is given to him alone, and that no corresponding right is given to anyone else. He is at liberty to exercise the power or not as he pleases, and to any extent he pleases, provided only that the provision he makes for a younger child shall not exceed in amount the proportion of the free rents authorised by the statute. So far, we do not understand that there is any controversy between the parties. The only question is, whether in case he has more than one child to provide for, he is restricted by the statute in settling and disposing of a provision, the total amount of which does not exceed the sum with which he is entitled to burden succeeding heirs. We are of opinion that he is not so restricted.

The question depends upon the construction of the proviso for limiting the amount of the provision; and we think the object and effect of that proviso is to determine the proportion which the total amount of the provision must bear to the rental of the estate, and that it has no other effect. We are far from thinking that the question is free from difficulty, or that the words of the proviso, if taken alone, will bear no other construction. But they must be read in connection with the enabling part of the enactment which they are intended to qualify; and when so read, the reasonable construction appears to us to be as we have stated. The statute empowers the heir to make provision for his younger children, subject to this condition, that "such provision shall in no case exceed" certain amounts; and then it proceeds to specify the maximum amount which may be given in each of three several cases: "for one child" the provision shall not exceed a sum equal to one year's rent; for two children two years' rent; and for three or more children three years' rent. We cannot think that the words "for one child," mean for "any one child," whatever be the number of children for whom the heir makes provision. If this had been the intention, it must have been so expressed. But this part of the clause is intended to refer to the case of there being one child only for whom provision has to be made; and accordingly, when the statute goes on to provide for the case of three or more children, it does not contemplate a separate provision for each, the amount of which is to be measured by anything that has gone before, but a total provision for all, the amount of which is not to exceed three years' rent. The statute, in our judgment, merely fixes the measure of the right given to the heir to bind the succeeding heirs in the several cases mentioned. If the heir makes provision for three children, or for four, there is nothing in the statute to require that each of the four shall have no more than a fourth part, or each of the three no more than a third part of three years' rent. The words of the proviso are satisfied if the total amount of the provision, in either case, does not exceed three years' rent. And there is certainly nothing in the purpose or reason of the enactment to import a restriction which is not expressed in terms. It was indispensable, from the nature of the enactment, that the total amount of the burden to be imposed on succeeding heirs should be fixed, and it is very intelligible that it should be fixed with reference to the number of children to be provided for. But it is not to be assumed, in the absence of an express enactment for that purpose, that the Legislature intended to go farther, and to regulate the distribution to any effect, or to deprive the father of a discretion which he alone would have the means for exercising with advantage to his family. And, therefore, if he should think fit to give one-half of the whole provision to one child among four, and to divide the remaining half among the other three, the statute gives no right to any one to take objection to that arrangement. The succeeding heir is not prejudiced, because no greater burden has been laid on him than his predecessor had right to impose; and the younger children are not prejudiced, because they have no right to anything except what their father thinks fit to give them.

But if the heir in possession may give to one child out of three or more more than one-third of the total provision, we think it follows, by parity of reasoning, that he may give him the whole amount, to the exclusion of the others. The excluded children have no title to complain; and the succeeding heir has no more interest in this case than in the former, for the provision, however it may be distributed, does not exceed the statutory amount. It is said that in this case the words of the statute are violated, because a provision from which one child alone takes any direct benefit is not a provision for three or more. But the objection appears to us to rest upon too narrow a construction. If the words were taken alone, a provision "for three children" might very well mean a provision to or in favour of three, and no fewer. But the preposition "for" has a variety of meanings; and the precise force which it ought to receive in the particular case must depend upon the context. Now the statute, as has been seen, does not contemplate the children directly as the subjects of any right which it creates. It empowers the father to make a provision for them, varying in amount according to their number; and it is in a clause for determining the total amount which may be given, in each of three different cases, that the words in question occur. In this connection, the word "for" may fairly be construed as meaning "in respect of," or "in the case of," referring merely to the fact of there being one, two, or more younger children to be provided for, but without implying that each, if there be more than one, is to take a direct and separate interest under the provision.

A different construction would, in our judgment, tend to defeat the purpose of the statute. It is a beneficial provision in favour of heirs of entail. But there may be many cases—and the present case is an example—in which the heir would be prevented from making the best use, or even a just and reasonable use, of his power under the statute, if he were precluded from taking into consideration, in exercising the power, the whole means at his disposal for providing for his younger children, and the different claims or necessities of each. He may think it fitting to give the whole, or the greater portion, of the statutory provision to one child, either because the others have been already provided for, or for other reasons of which he alone can judge; and we think it would be contrary to the policy of the statute that he should be precluded from giving due effect to the considerations which ought to influence a father in the disposal of his means, by any fixed and rigid rule as to the apportionment of the sum with which he is entitled to charge the succeeding heirs of entail.

The true meaning of the enactment, therefore, appears to us to be that the heir in possession may make provision for his younger children, to an amount not exceeding three years' rent, if he have three such children or more to provide for; and that if he does not exceed that amount, he may divide it among them, or give the whole to one, as he thinks fit. And we think this construction is supported by authority of weight. It is true that the question has not been directly decided. But the current of judicial opinion at all events since the case of Antrobus is all in this direction. The opinion of Lord Newton in that case may not be technically binding; but it is of high authority, and we believe it to have been generally accepted as a sound exposition of the statute. The point is assumed as clear by the Lord President and Lord Moncreiff in the Breadalbane case; and we are satisfied that the practice has been in accordance with their opinion. This is a most valuable aid in the interpretation of a statute; and if the question were otherwise more doubtful than we believe it to be, we should hesitate to disturb a construction which has been accepted by the profession, and acted on for so long a period.

Lord Lee.—As the granter of the bond in question held his estate under the fetters of a strict entail, complete in all the fettering clauses, and containing no reservation of any power to grant provisions to younger children, I think that the question is whether the Statute 5 Geo. IV. cap. 87, authorised him to grant a bond in favour of one of his younger children (there being three or more), binding the succeeding heirs to the extent of three years' free rent, or to any extent exceeding one year's free rent.

It has been suggested that the effect of the statute is very much the same as the effect of a reserved power in the deed of entail, "to provide younger children to three years' free rent" (such as existed in the case of Viscountess Strathallan, 2 D. 840, affd. 5 Bell's App. 396), and that therefore, in virtue of the statutory powers, the heir in possession, having three or more younger children, is just in the position of an unlimited proprietor of the estate to the extent of three years' free rent.

If this were a sound view, it would, I think, lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the bond here in question is valid in favour of William Paterson to the full extent of three years' free rent.

But my opinion is that the case of a bond granted under the statute alone (the fetters of the entail being complete and perfect) is altogether different.

The statute is so expressed as to keep up the fetters of the entail excepting in so far as relaxed to the effect of exercising the powers thereby conferred, and these powers are granted "under certain regulations and conditions," which are specified. The powers only enable the heir in possession to bind the succeeding heirs.

In the case, therefore, of a bond granted under the statute, I think that it cannot be said that it is the granter's infeftment as proprietor of the lands that makes it effectual. It is the power granted by the statute; and, in my opinion, its validity and effect must depend upon the question whether it has been executed in terms of the statutory powers. I think that this was settled in Lady Elizabeth Pringle's case (Breadalbane Trustees, 2 D. 904), and the Judges in the case of Grierson v. Grierson (6 D. 203) so regarded it. The Lord Justice-Clerk there stated, in distinguishing the two cases, "the bond granted must be in terms of the statute, and the power must be exercised in the form and mode pointed out by the statute. I think that the Breadalbane case has fixed that principle of construction."

The distinction between powers reserved in the entail and powers conferred by statute upon heirs in possession holding under the fetters of a strict entail was dwelt upon by Lord Fullerton in the case of Viscountess Strathallan (2 D. 840). His opinion contains the following passage at p. 864:—"For in this one most important particular the present case differs from that arising under the settlements executed by Lord Breadalbane. The entail there was complete, and did completely exclude provisions such as that which was granted. The power sought to be exercised was one conferred by special statute, dispensing, to a certain extent, with the fetters. It was there powerfully argued that unless the provision was clearly and strictly within the line to which the statute extended the power, it could not be sustained. Here the question arises under a power granted by the entail itself, and a power granted under the express forms of an exception and reservation from the prohibitive and resolutive clauses." Lord Medwyn (at p. 849) draws the distinction not less pointedly. It thus appears that even the Judges in the minority in Lord Breadalbane's case recognised the difference of the question under the statute.

While, therefore, the heir in possession may quite truly be said to be free, excepting in so far as he is fettered, I think it not less clearly settled by the decision in Lady Elizabeth Pringle's case that, if the fetters of the entail be complete, he cannot exercise the statutory power of burdening succeeding heirs with provisions, otherwise than subject to the "regulations and conditions" of the statute.

This being so, the question is, whether the bond in question is in accordance with these regulations and conditions, and, if so, to what extent?

My opinion is that the statute empowers the heir of entail in possession to grant a bond of provision in favour of one only of several younger children, if he sees fit to do so; but in that case I think that he is subject to the statutory condition that "for one child" the amount of such provision shall not exceed one year's free rent. If he shall desire to grant a bond of provision in favour of three or more younger children, he is empowered to do so, but still subject to the condition that "in no case" shall the amount of such provision exceed, for one child, one year's free rent.

If it had been intended to enable the heir in possession to accumulate the whole provisions authorised to be charged against succeeding heirs upon one of several younger children, I think that the statute would have been differently expressed. It would have been very simple to express it in like manner to the clause in the Strathord entail (Strathallan v. Duke of Northumberland, 2 D. 840). The fact that it was not so expressed, and that the declared object of the statute is to confer or enlarge, "under certain regulations and conditions," the powers of granting provisions, appears to me to indicate that the proportion to be observed in limiting the amount was intended to be dependent on the number of children to be provided out of the rents of that estate, and not upon the number of children existing. I find nothing in the statute to support the view that the heir was empowered to exercise in favour of one child the whole power conferred upon him for three or more children. My view of the statute is, that it only authorises the succeeding heirs to be burdened with provisions out of the rents of that estate, according to the number of children for whom such provisions shall be granted; and that a provision for one child exceeding one year's free rent is not authorised.

It is suggested that the heir in possession may have other estates, entailed or unentailed, out of which he has provided or may provide for the other children. In that case I think that he should have no difficulty in exercising the power conferred by the statute in conformity to its conditions.

But if it be consistent with a sound construction of the statute that the heir in possession may grant the whole amount of three years' free rent out of one estate to one of his younger children, I think that he must have power to do this in favour of the same child, in the case of each of his entailed estates (however numerous), and in each case to leave his other younger children unprovided. It seems impossible to regard the fact that he may make, or may have made, provision otherwise for his other younger children, as affecting the question whether the bond is valid under the statute to any extent beyond one year's free rent for one child.

If the Legislature had intended that the whole amount of three years' rent might be accumulated upon one of several younger children, and that nobody should have any title to object so long as that amount was not exceeded, I cannot understand why one younger child should not have been allowed, in all cases (whether there be one or many younger children), the full amount of three years' free rent. Why should the heir in possession be authorised to provide one of several younger children with three years' free rent (leaving the others possibly unprovided), and be unauthorised to provide him to the same extent where there are no others to be provided? I think that the provision of the statute "that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following," must receive effect; and that the succeeding heir has an unquestionable right to insist upon it.

My opinion on the whole is that the bond in question is not valid in favour of William A. Orr Paterson, excepting to the extent of one year's free rent, and that the whole amount of three years' free rent (assuming the sums of £600 and £400 with one year's free rent to be less than three years' free rent) can only be made good under the bond against the succeeding heir, by adopting the alternative of dividing it in equal proportions among the whole younger children.

I have only to add, with reference to Lord Newton's opinion in the case of Antrobus, that the opinions delivered in the Inner-House seem to me to indicate that the judgment of the Court did not imply any adoption of that part of the Lord Ordinary's opinion which is now founded on, and that I respectfully dissent from it as not consistent with a sound view of the statute.

Lord Fraser.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Trayner.

Lord M'Laren.—I was at first disposed to favour the view represented by the second alternative; but after reading the opinion signed by the Lord President and other Judges, I have come to concur in the results at which they have arrived, and in the main in their reasoning.

To a complete expression of my view, it is only necessary that I should add a few sentences.

The statute empowers the heir to create a fund of provision, to be ascertained by reference to rental; and the amount of the provision "for three or more children" is to be a sum not exceeding "three years' free rent or value in the whole." The words "in the whole," imply that provisions of unequal amounts may be granted to the children who are creditors in the bond, provided their aggregate value does not exceed the ascertained sum based on three years' rent or value.

Now, in general, when a father, or person in loco parentis, was empowered to apportion a fund amongst a family, our law (before it was altered by statute) would not permit him to apportion a vanishing share to any member of the family. This, no doubt, would be the logical limit of an unqualified power of apportionment; but the legal limit was that a substantial share must be given to each child.

The limitation of the power, however, presupposes that there is a right on the part of each child to receive a share of the fund; and had the language of the Aberdeen Act been consistent with the view that every one of the younger children is to have a right of participation in the fund, then I should have held that the father could not appoint unsubstantial shares to certain of the children, or give the whole to one child. But the statute is complied with in form and substance by a bond in favour of three children out of a family of six; and as no one child has an antecedent right to say that he or she must be one of the three children in whose favour the bond is to be granted, I infer that no child has a title or interest to complain that vanishing shares are given to any of the objects of the power, or (which is the same thing) that the entire fund is given to one.

LORD TRAYNER.—The bond of provision in question is one granted by an heir of entail in possession, in favour of his younger children, in virtue of the powers conferred on heirs of entail by the Aberdeen Act. By it the granter binds and obliges himself and the heirs of entail succeeding him (1) to pay to William, his second son, the sum of £10,000; or in the event of its being found that to provide the whole of said sum to his said son was in excess of his powers, then (2) to pay the said sum to his sons William, Charles, and Henry in the proportions following—viz., to William £9000, to Charles £600, and to Henry £400; and in the event of that also being found to be in excess of his powers, (3) to pay said sum of £10,000 among his whole younger children (five in number) in equal proportions. The £10,000 thus provided was regarded by the granter as the amount of three years' free rent of the entailed estate, and it is provided that in the event of its being ascertained that said sum exceeded three years' free rent, then "the said sum or sums, as the case may be, shall be and are hereby proportionally restricted, so as to be consistent with the powers conferred by said statute." The question now is, who is entitled to the provision thus made? Is William entitled to the whole £10,000; or, is it divisible in the proportions foresaid between William, Charles, and Henry; or, is it divisible among the whole of the younger children in equal shares?

The solution of the question now to be determined depends largely on the construction to be given to the fourth section of the Aberdeen Act, quoted in the bond of provision. It provides that an heir of entail in possession shall be entitled to grant bonds of provision or obligations binding the succeeding heirs of entail to make payment to the younger children of the granter of the bond "of such sum or sums of money, bearing interest from the granter's death, as to him or her shall seem fit; provided always that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following . . . that is to say, for one child one year's free rent or value, for two children two years' free rent or value, and for three or more children three years' free rent or value in the whole." It does not occur to me that the terms of this clause are ambiguous, or its meaning doubtful. If a provision is made for one younger child, that provision shall not exceed one year's free rent; if for three or more younger children, it shall not exceed three years' rent. The number of younger children which the heir granting the provision may have existing at the date of the bond, or at any other time, does not appear to me to enter into the question. That matter is not taken into account in the statute. The only fact (so far as the number of the younger children is concerned) which requires to be, or can be, considered is, the number of children in whose favour the provision is made. The heir in possession is at liberty to make provision for his younger children out of the rents of the entailed estate, or not, as he pleases. But if he does make such provision, it shall not exceed the proportions specified. If, therefore, having a dozen children, he makes provision merely for one of them, he cannot make that provision in excess of one year's rent; if for three or more of them, three years' rents. Whether, therefore, a bond of provision granted under this statutory authority is valid and effectual or is not so, will depend upon the number of children provided for and the amount of the provision made. Children existing but not provided for are not taken (as I have said) into account by the statute.

This being my view of the statute, it follows, in my opinion, that the first branch of the threefold provision in question cannot be given effect to. It is a provision expressly in favour of one child (William) for a sum exceeding one year's rent; it is, in fact, a provision for one child to the extent of three years' rent, and is therefore not authorised by the statute.

It is maintained on behalf of William that there is authority for holding that this provision in his favour is valid, and reference is made to the opinion of Lord Newton in Antrobus v. Innes, 25th November 1830 (9 S. 70), and the opinion of the Lords President (Hope), Moncreiff, and Murray in Breadalbane, 26th May 1840 (2 D. 917). The opinion of Lord Newton (given in a note to a judgment which was brought under review) undoubtedly favours the contention in support of which it is cited. But it has to be observed, in the first place, that the case in which that opinion was delivered was decided upon grounds that rendered it unnecessary to put any construction on the Aberdeen Act; and in the second place, that the other Judges, when the opinion in question was brought under their notice, expressly refused to take it into consideration, as being unnecessary to the decision of the question before them (3 Deas and Anderson, 286). Lord Newton's opinion, therefore, stands in the position of being obiter, and not confirmed, but practically put aside by the Judges who were reviewing his interlocutor. The opinion by the Lord President and others in the Breadalbane case was also obiter; the question now raised (for the first time directly raised) was not argued before them. They were dealing with a totally different issue. These opinions, therefore, although the opinions of eminent Judges, cannot be accepted as authority in the decision of a question which was not before them, or argued, or considered.

The Glenlyon case (2 D. 840) is referred to also as an authority "finding that the heir of entail had power to provide the whole three years' rent to one younger child." No doubt that was the result of the judgment, but the circumstances of that case make the judgment of no authority in the present. That case did not depend upon the Aberdeen Act at all. It was a case where, by the terms of the deed of entail, the heir in possession was authorised "to provide younger or other children besides the heir to three years' free rent," &c. Under that power, and not by virtue of the statute, the heir in possession provided the whole three years' rents to one younger child, and the provision was held good, because the power given under the entail was held practically to exempt the three years' rents from the fetters of the entail, and to leave the heir in possession the power of dealing with them as if he had been proprietor in fee-simple. How little that case bears, as authority, upon the present may be gathered from the following passage in the opinion of Lord Meadowbank (2 D. 856):—"In conclusion, I beg leave to observe that it does not appear to me that much light can be thrown upon this case by a reference to that of the Trustees of the Mar- quess of Breadalbane and Lady E. Pringle, the one arising in a clause under a deed of entail, and the other under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, to each of which respectively very different rules of construction are to be applied. In the case of construing powers conferred by a tailzie, the principle unquestionably is to give that interpretation which is most calculated for leaving the heir in possession free and unfettered; while powers conferred by statute cannot be extended beyond what the terms employed plainly and distinctly import, and are subjected to a more strict and rigid construction."

I am of opinion that there is no authority for holding that under any reasonable construction of the Aberdeen Act a bond of provision solely in favour of one child can exceed the amount of one year's free rent. If there was any authority to that effect, it would appear to me to be in direct conflict with the higher authority of the Act itself.

The second branch of the provision in question stands in a different position. It is a provision in favour of three children of the granter, although that provision is distributed in unequal shares. This inequality in the distribution of the provision is made the ground of objection to it. It is said on behalf of the whole younger children (except William) that "if the granter is to exercise his full power under the statute, he must give to each of the younger children an equal share of the provision." The answer to that objection seems to me to be that the statute imposes no such obligation on the granter of the provision; it makes no reference whatever to the distribution or division of the provision which it authorises to be made. It does not require the heir in possession to make any provision for younger children; it confers on the younger children no right to demand any provision; it confers on them no right which would entitle them to question the legality or the propriety of any such provision, no matter in what terms it is conceived. The succeeding heir has a right to challenge the provision if made otherwise than as according to statute; but in my opinion no one except the succeeding heir can make such challenge, and he only on the ground I have stated. The succeeding heir in the present case takes no objection to the validity of this branch of the provision, and rightly so, in my opinion. Being a provision in favour of three younger children, to the extent of three years' rents (for I assume meantime that the £10,000 does not exceed the sum of three years' rents), he has no interest to object. Even if any objection were offered to this branch of the provision on the ground of unequal distribution, by children having an interest and title to object, in my opinion the objection should be repelled. (1) If the heir in possession has made a provision authorised by the statute, it is not to be subjected to any limitation which the statute does not impose. The statute imposes no restriction or limitation on the heir making the provision beyond this, that it shall for a certain number of children not exceed a certain sum. How that sum is to be divided the statute does not say. It must therefore be left to the heir making the provision to say how it is to be divided. Nobody else can do so; the succeeding heir cannot do so, nor can the younger children, whether partly benefited by, or entirely excluded from, the provision. (2) When the provision has been made, the amount of that provision is practically set free from the entail restrictions, and may be dealt with by the heir making the provision as a fund of which he is proprietor in fee-simple, and he may dispose of it as he pleases, provided he benefits none but younger children, that being a limitation imposed upon his power by the statute. "The effect of the statute in this particular is to place the entailed proprietor in regard to provisions in terms of the statute exactly on the same footing as if to that extent the rents of the entailed estate formed part of his unlimited property"—(per Lord Fullarton in the Breadalbane case). (3) The same doctrine is recognised in the cases of Grierson (6 D. 203), and Campbell (23 D. 159).

It has been suggested that the second branch of the provision in question is not one provision for three children, but constitutes in fact three bonds—one in favour of William, one for Charles, and one for Henry—and that the provision for William is not in conformity with the statute, in respect it exceeds one year's rent. I am not able to adopt this view. I take the bond in question to be what it professes to be, and what I think it truly is—namely, one bond of provision in favour of three younger children, the amount in which is not disconform to the statute, in respect that for the three children the provision made does not exceed the statutory limit of three years' rent. That one child may take more than another under that bond does not, in my opinion, make the bond disconform to the statute, which does not provide that in no case shall one child get more than one year's rent. It provides that the rents of the entailed estate shall not be burdened beyond a certain amount as a provision for a certain number of children, but nowhere provides what each or any child's share shall be. If the bond is otherwise conform to statute, the resulting interests under that bond will not make it disconform. This again is an objection which no one interested in the provision has any title or interest to maintain. The succeeding heir cannot object, for the rents of the estate have not been burdened beyond what the statute allows—three years' rents for three children. And accordingly the heir now in possession is not maintaining this objection. Nor can the younger children (Charles and Henry) object on this ground, for they had no right to any provision whatever, and therefore they cannot object that the provision actually made for them is not so large as it might have been had their father been disposed to make it larger.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the parties entitled to the sum due under the bond of provision in question are William, Charles, and Henry Paterson, in the proportions of £9000 to William, £600 to Charles, and £400 to Henry. If it be ascertained that the sum of £10,000 exceeds the amount of three years' free rent, the sums payable to William, Charles, and Henry respectively will suffer proportionate abatement.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur in the opinions of the Lord President and the other Judges who agree with him.

Lord Young.—I am not able to concur in that opinion. It ends with a sentence which struck me a good deal—that "if the question were otherwise more doubtful than we believe it to be, we should hesitate to disturb a construction which has been accepted by the profession, and acted on for so long a period." I am not at all aware that the construction which these learned Judges put upon the statute has been "accepted by the profession and acted on for so long a period." I know of no evidence of that at all. The present case seems to afford some evidence to the contrary. For, in the first place, this deed, prepared I do not know by whom, but I assume by an experienced conveyancer, presents three alternatives, the maker of the deed, with the advice of his agent who prepared it, being doubtful as to the construction of the statute. He presents the alternatives in the order in which he prefers them, but there is no indication there that there is a construction which has been accepted by the profession and acted on for a long period. After providing three years' rent to one son, he goes on—"But in the event of its being found to be in excess of my powers" to do that, then he does something else. And then again, "or otherwise, and in the event of its being found to be in excess of my powers either to provide the whole of the said sum," and so on, then he does something else. There is no indication there of a construction which has been accepted by the profession and acted on for a long period. Then, if I look to the judicial opinions here, I find five of the learned Judges, and your Lordship now concurring with them will make six, who say that any one of these alternatives is as good as another. That is the opinion of six of the learned Judges. Two of the learned Judges—Lord Fraser, and Lord Trayner—are of an opinion contrary to that of the six learned Judges whom I have first referred to, that the construction of the statute upon which the first alternative proceeds is quite erroneous and untenable—that is to say, they think the construction to be quite erroneous and untenable which has been accepted by the profession and acted on for so long a period. Then another learned Judge—Lord Lee, with whom I happen to agree,—thinks the construction on which the first alternative proceeds is inadmissible, and that the only alternative proceeding on an admissible construction of the statute is the last.

Well, there is a variety of opinion as to the construction of the statute on the bench, as well as in the profession, as shewn by the deed before us; and I must therefore think that the construction is a fair question to be put to the Court and determined deliberately, not as disturbing what has been universally accepted to be the true construction, but as deciding now for the first time—for so far as anybody knows, it never was decided before—what is the true construction of the statute? And as I have said, at the stage which the case has now reached, and when I am delivering my opinion, there is a great variety of opinion upon the question.

I think with Lord Lee that the construction upon which the first and also the second alternative proceeds are quite inadmissible.

The first alternative is a provision in favour of the second son. The granter of the deed only means to provide for him—to make a provision in his favour—stating the quite satisfactory reason that his other younger children are otherwise quite satisfactorily provided for. Therefore he has no intention of providing for them. Then he goes on,—"Or otherwise, and in the event of its being found to be in excess of my powers either to provide the whole of said sum to my son William Alexander Orr Paterson, or to apportion it among my said three sons in manner before mentioned (but in that event only), then to content and pay the said sum of £10,000 sterling among the said William Alexander Orr Paterson, Charles Orr Paterson, and Henry Edmund Paterson," and so on. If that is a provision for three or more of the children it is intelligible; if it is a provision for only one child, which I think it clearly is, it is certainly bad; and the opinion that it is good proceeds upon the view that it is a provision not for one child but for three. Now, I cannot accept it, but that is the opinion which, according to the view of five of the consulted Judges and of your Lordship, must prevail. But for the variety of opinion upon it the language of the statute I should have thought too clear to admit of any doubt, that the provision for one child shall not exceed one year's free rent or value of the estate. That language is, "provided always that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following," that is to say, for one child one year's free rent or value. And if this is a provision for one child, which I have said I think it is, then if the amount of the provision exceeds one year's free rent or value—being up to three years' free rent or value—it is in my opinion bad.

But it is said, and I confess it is the only argument in favour of the view I am opposing that I have seen, that the heir of entail does not object, and that the younger children have no interest to object, and that therefore it must be good. Now, it is quite certain that the heir of entail does not object, and it is quite certain that he has no interest to do so, because under this deed the heir of entail will have to pay £10,000, for one or other of the three alternatives must prevail, and each of them imposes an obligation on him to pay £10,000.

But is there no interest? Have the younger children no interest? It is said they have no interest. Why? Because there is no obligation on the parent to provide for any of them. I quite admit that. And if there had been no alternative in their favour they would have had no interest, and they would not have been listened to for a moment. If an heir of entail in possession makes a bond of provision in favour of one younger child for three years' free rent, or for four years', or for ten years', and the heir of entail is willing to pay it, the other younger children have no manner of title to object. They are not called in at all. It is for the heir of entail to object if he thinks fit. If he chooses to pay the money to a man who has no title to demand it, that is no affair of the other younger children, in whose favour the father is under no obligation.

But to go into that is to lose sight of the deed that is before us. The maker of the deed says,—"If that is not according to the true meaning of the entail, then I dispose of the fund otherwise. I give it to the other younger children in that event." That gives them an interest which otherwise they would not have had. But in the same way, suppose there is authority in the heir of entail in possession to make provision in favour of his widow. It happens to be in her case by way of liferent or annuity—an annuity not exceeding a third of the free rental of the estate. Suppose the man married a widow, and before his death he reasoned thus,—"It is all one to the heir of entail whether he pays the three years' free rent to my widow, or to one of my younger children whom I choose to nominate if I can under the Act of Parliament. My widow will be well provided for. She is another man's widow too, and she will have when I die £10,000 a-year. There is no occasion to provide for her, but I am empowered by the statute to provide for her, and instead of giving it to her who does not need it, I will give it to my son, or one of my daughters." Well, if he did that, and the heir of entail chose to pay it, as he might do out of regard to his father, or from any other motive, the widow would have no right to object at all, because he was under no obligation to make provision for her—none at all. But if he had made it as here,—"If by the statute I am empowered to give to my son or daughter this provision which the statute enables me to give to the widow, I will do it. But if that is not within my power under the statute, then I desire that my widow shall have it"—would she not have an interest then? Must we not have sustained her claim? and that upon the footing that there is no authority in the statute to give that to the son or daughter, and therefore the first provision must fail, but there is authority to give it to the widow, and therefore the second must have effect. All this reasoning, upon which the opinions which I am now expressing my grounds for differing from proceed, would be equally good in that case. It is all one to the heir whether he gives the annuity to the widow or to a son or daughter. It is of the same amount, and if he do not object, then the widow cannot object, because there is no right in her to demand the provision. But in the case I have put, in which the granter of the bond said,—"If I can by the statute give the widow's provision to a son or daughter, I do it; but if I cannot I give it to the widow"—then we would certainly sustain the widow's claim.

These are the grounds on which I reject, and I must say without any doubts or misgivings in my own mind, the construction of this statute on which this first provision proceeds. It is somewhat remarkable, it appears to me, that Lord Trayner, who concurs in that, thinks that the same result practically may be attained by giving one child a provision not of full three years' rents, but by giving small provisions to the others. I have a strong opinion against that. I think the provision is absolute. The provision for one child shall not exceed one year's free rent, and you cannot make it exceed one year's free rent by the palpable device of making it two years and three-quarters', or two years and nine-tenths', and dividing the fraction of the third year amongst the other younger children. That is the merest pretence, and is, I think, a violation of the Act of Parliament. I do not think immaterial that provision of the statute which says that one child is only to have one year's free rent, whatever the number of the children may be. You may give them, if they are up to the number of three or more, three years' free rent, but upon the condition that no one child shall have more than one. And what is the good sense of the thing upon another consideration? According to the opinion which is to prevail here, the eldest son is to have £10,000. If his two younger brothers had died, he could only have got a third of that. That is absolutely certain. Now, taking it as a matter of sense, what is the sense of a construction of the statute which makes the provision depend upon the death or the survivance of children who take nothing? A man has three children. He gives £10,000, which is assumed to be three years' free rent, to one of them, and not a shilling to the other two, and that upon a statement that they do not require any provision. If these two, who require nothing and take nothing, survive the testator, the one child shall have £10,000. If they do not, although nothing is given to them and nothing taken by them, that £10,000 provision is reduced to a third. Now, I must say my mind rebels at that as a reasonable construction of the Act of Parliament. A man has three daughters. One of them is unprovided for. The other two are married. They are duchesses. He gives three years' free rent to the child who is unprovided for. She will take that if the duchesses survive their father, but if they die, although they take nothing from him or from the entailed estate at all, then her provision is cut down to a third. Now, I avoid all that by simply construing the language of the statute according to the plain import of the words—the provision for one child shall not exceed one year's free rent. No matter how many children there are, the provision for no one shall exceed under any circumstances a year's rent. If there are more children up to three, you may divide three years' free rent amongst them as you please, subject only to this, that no one of them shall have more than one. That is a very plain

No. 179. and simple and, to my mind, sensible construction. The other I cannot assent to. My opinion here therefore accords with that of Lord Lee. I think the last alternative is the only alternative which proceeds upon a right construction of the statute, or, in other words, is according to the powers of the heir of entail, and therefore must necessarily prevail in favour of those in whose favour the alternative is made. It is not because they had any right to demand the provision that I so decide, but because there is a provision in their favour which, if it is the only alternative under which the heir of entail was entitled to act, they are entitled to insist in.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with the opinion of the Lord President and of the other Judges who concur with him.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the special case, with the opinions of the consulted Judges, in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the Judges of the whole Court, answer the second question to the effect that the third party is entitled to the sum due under the bond of provision: Find and declare accordingly: Find the parties of the fourth and fifth part entitled to payment out of the sum payable under the said bond of the expenses incurred by them since the 2d day of July 1887: Remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report, and decern."

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

JAMES RITCHIE, sometime merchant in San Francisco, thereafter residing in Newton-upon-Ayr, died in May 1871. He left a trust-disposition and settlement conveying his whole estate heritable and moveable to trustees, including his brother Joseph Ritchie, J. B. King, and Alexander Cuthbert. The trustees were directed, after paying the truster's debts, to apply the residue of the estate for behoof of Joseph Ritchie and Mrs

Margaret Boyd or Ritchie, his wife, and the survivor in liferent only, which liferent was declared to be alimentary, and for behoof of Alexander Ritchie, son of Mr and Mrs Joseph Ritchie in fee.

Power was given to the trustees "to invest the trust funds in any of the Government securities, or upon heritable security in Scotland, or in such other way or on such other securities as my trustees shall think proper, and to continue the investments, or to vary or alter the same from time to time at their discretion: . . . And I hereby provide and declare that my trustees shall not be liable for the solvency of any person or persons to whom they may sell or dispose of any part of the trust-estate, or to whom they may lend any part of the trust funds, farther than that such person or persons were habit and repute solvent at the time of transacting; nor shall they be further liable for any factor or factors, attorney or attorneys, whom they may appoint, than that such factor or factors, attorney or attorneys, were habit and repute responsible at the time of their appointment; nor shall they be liable for loss or depreciation in the investments of the trust-funds. . . ."

In 1872 Joseph Ritchie, with the concurrence of his wife, applied to the trustees for a loan of £1000 over a house, Vancouver Lodge, which he erected at a cost of £1300. The £1000 was advanced and Joseph Ritchie occupied the house till he died in May 1876, and his widow and son occupied it for some time. They afterwards let it at a rent of £45, and removed to another.

In January 1874 the trustees purchased £1200 paid-up stock of the Anglo-American Telegraph Company, Limited, for £979, 8s. 2d. This was done at the request of Joseph Ritchie, and as the minute of trustees bore in order to benefit him as liferent beneficiary of the estate. In December 1874 other £2000 of that stock was, on the request of Joseph Ritchie, purchased for £1395, 10s. 11d. After Joseph Ritchie's death his widow requested that this investment be continued, and in token thereof signed a docquet of approval to the trustees' minute continuing it. In 1880 the stock having somewhat depreciated, the widow and her son Alexander Ritchie, then a minor, with her consent as his administratrix, delivered to the trustees a joint letter of request and guarantee requesting them to continue the investment, ratifying and approving thereof, and guaranteeing the trustees against responsibility and loss which might arise therefrom.

In February 1884 the trustees, after a report from their agent, held a meeting to ascertain whether in view of the increased depreciation of the stock, the beneficiaries desired to retain it, and Mrs Ritchie and her son as the beneficiaries then requested that it should be realised. The stock on being realised yielded £1192, 17s. 10d. less than what the trustees had paid for it.

At Whitsunday 1876 £1400 of the trust-funds had been lodged upon deposit-receipt with the Scottish Amicable Heritable Securities Association, Limited, which afterwards went into liquidation.

This investment was ratified and approved by Mrs Ritchie and her son at the same time as they granted the letter of guarantee above mentioned.

On 16th April 1887 Mrs Joseph Ritchie and Alexander Ritchie, as liferenter and fiar respectively of James Ritchie's estate, raised an action against Mr Cuthbert, the sole survivor of the original trustees, and against Alexander King, the representative of J. B. King, a deceased trustee, and against certain assumed trustees, concluding (1) for a count and reckoning by the trustees for James Ritchie's estate, and for payment of the balance due, or otherwise (2) for declarator that the trustees were vestment in telegraph shares, and on deposit with the Heritable Company, on which alone they offered argument)—(a) As to the Anglo-American Telegraph Shares.—Alexander Ritchie could not be said to have homologated the investment he now disputed, for his consent was given when in minority, and was subsequently recalled when he requested the stock to be sold. The placing money in this undertaking was not "investing" or placing it on "securities," as the trust-deed required. It was trading with it and exposing it to the risks of trade. An investment involved a debtor and security. It did not make the case for the trustees better in a question with the fiar, the pursuer Alexander Ritchie, that this mode of employing the money was first resorted to in order to give a higher return to the liferenter. Purchasing bank stock would have been an unlawful use of the money, for that was just trading with it, not an investment of it.[1] Only unlimited powers of using the trust money would justify such use of it. The powers of the trust were not by any means unlimited. It was to be "investing" on "securities," and a particular enumeration of investments, viz., "any of the Government securities," "heritable security in Scotland," was prefixed to the more general words, "or in such other way, or in such other securities, as my trustees shall think proper." The general words must be construed to mean "such other securities ejusdem generis as are before pointed out." Besides assuming the general words to have stood alone they would have left the trustees to their common law powers, as increased by the Trust Acts, 1867 and 1884.[2] (b) As to the "investment" on deposit with the Heritable Security Company.—The Lord Ordinary in his note erroneously called it a debenture. But it was a mere loan at interest, which the creditor was obliged to leave three years with the debtor. It could not even be called a loan on "personal security," for that expression involved stocks,—railway stocks, for example,—but were not entitled to invest in telegraph stocks, I should not be interpreting the power, but would be setting up a new power or a new order of legal investments, different from the recognised order, and not corresponding to anything written in the will.

"I find in the will an absolute reference to the judgment of the trustees in the matter of the choice of investments outside those which the law has recognised as suitable investments for trust money. Such a reference to the judgment of persons selected by the truster as good managers is neither an illegal nor a senseless thing. Being legal and rational, the power ought, in my opinion, to receive effect. The trustees exercised their judgment by investing in Anglo-American Telegraphs and Scottish Amicable Debentures, which they deemed good investments, yielding somewhat higher interest than heritable securities; and in my opinion the truster's authority is an indemnity to them against such a claim as the present.

"Of course, if a trustee or a body of trustees were to abuse a power of this description,—if, for example, they were to invest money in an undertaking which they knew to be bad, or which they had no reason to suppose to be good,—the clause would not protect them. But no such charge is made in the present action. It would be unfortunate if powers of investment were interpreted otherwise than according to the natural meaning; because a testator ought not to be allowed to lay a trap for his trustees inviting them to do something which the beneficiaries may either accept or repudiate according to the degree of success of the speculation. I am therefore for assoilzieing the trustees from this branch of the action."

Argued for defenders;—The defenders ought to have been assoilzied;—(1) As to the alleged loan to Joseph Ritchie over the house.—Assuming the proposition to be universally sound that trustees could not lend the trust funds to one of their own number, that was not the true nature of the transaction challenged. It was rather the acquiring of a house. To have purchased a house for the use of the fiar and liferenter according to their respective rights would not have been ultra vires. But this transaction of aiding the liferenter to acquire one and making an advance on the security of it, while he subsequently by his will conveyed it to his widow in liferent, and his child in fee, was in substance the same thing. The house was sufficient security for the loan. It was well let, and no money had been lost by reason of the transaction. (2) As to the investments challenged.—No case had been cited of trustees being found responsible for an investment where their powers were as wide as in the present case. There was no absolute common law rule.[2] In Grant v. Baillie the trustees had no wide discretionary powers. The only question there was whether investing in bank stock was within the powers of the trustees, and it was decided that investing on bank stock was not investing on personal security. It was no doubt trading with the money. But personal security meant the security of the personal undertaking of the borrower.[3] Investing meant in ordinary language laying out money to profit. The pursuers in their summons so used the term when they sought declarator that the defenders "were not entitled to invest" the trust funds in the stock of the Telegraph Company. The deposit with the Heritable Security Company was an investment in this sense also, and it was not a trading with the money. It was clearly within the power to invest it in such "way" as the trustees thought proper. The indemnity clause of the trust must be read along with the investment clause, and read together they gave the trustees ample discretion and full indemnity in the application of the trust funds.

The opinion of the Court (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK) was delivered by LORD CRAIGHILL.—This reclaiming note brings up an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in an action of count and reckoning, and of declarator of liability of the trustees in the administration of the trust affairs of the late James Ritchie, sometime merchant in San Francisco, and afterwards residing at Newton-upon-Ayr. The pursuer Mrs Ritchie is the sister-in-law of the truster, her deceased husband, Joseph Ritchie, having been a brother and one of his trustees, and one of the principal beneficiaries under the trust; and the other pursuer, Mr Alexander Ritchie, is a son of the female pursuer, Mrs Ritchie, and her husband, the late Joseph Ritchie. The defenders are Mr Cuthbert, the only surviving trustee of those named in the trust-deed, and the trustee or executor of another of the trustees, who died during the trust administration.

To say the least, as the Lord Ordinary observes, the action is singularly un-gracious. Assuming that advances were made which were not conformable to trust administration, or that money was laid out in a way not conformable to trust administration, it was well known to the pursuers that this was done upon the urgent instigation of Mr Joseph Ritchie, and he and his wife and his son were the only persons who benefited by that which was done. It may be that necessity is the explanation, but most people would have suffered far more than the pursuers have suffered before they could or would have consented to bring into trouble those who did that which is now objected to solely to oblige the pursuers and Joseph Ritchie.

These considerations of course make no change on the legal merits of the controversy, but all the same it is right that persons like the pursuers should be exposed when they try to make money out of their own wrong.

There are four questions which are presented for consideration and determination. One is the payment of capital to the liferenter, in place of limiting the payments to the income of the estate. This for the present, at least, has been made matter of arrangement between the parties. The Lord Ordinary, in the first finding of his interlocutor, has remitted the trust accounts to Mr Baxter, as Accountant and Auditor of Court, to audit the cash and business accounts of the estate. This was acquiesced in both by the pursuers and by the defenders, and the consequence is, as explained by the Lord Ordinary (Note, p. 2) that, upon his recommendation, counsel upon both sides agreed that an audit should be taken, without allowing a proof; and so, for the present at least, the first of the four questions does not call for consideration. Once there has been an audit, it is possible that there may be points of controversy upon which it will be necessary for the Court to pronounce judgment. Meantime, however, all are agreed as to the course which should be pursued.

The next question is as to the validity of the loan to Joseph Ritchie, the brother of the truster, and the husband of the pursuer Mrs Ritchie. The trustees say that Joseph Ritchie, after his brother's death, determined to erect a house in Ayr for the occupation of himself and his family, and that they, knowing that the trust funds had been left by the truster for the comfort in life of his brother and family, lent Joseph part of the trust funds on the security of the house. The cost of the house is stated by the pursuers to be £1100 odds, and by the defenders to be £1300. The sum lent on the security of the house was £1000. The objection to the investment is that Joseph Ritchie, being a trustee, could not, without violation of trust law, borrow, any more than the trustees could lend. The Lord Ordinary obviously thinks if there is to be a loss, the loss must be made good by the trustees, but he has by the second finding in his interlocutor found that the security ought to be carried to a suspense account. He therefore directs the trustees to call up the loan, and if necessary to exercise their powers of sale under the said heritable security, reserving all questions of ultimate liability for the loss, if any, arising out of the said loan. For my own part I consider that the question of liability ought to be determined at once, and there cannot be any doubt as to that which is the legal result. Joseph Ritchie was a trustee. He was ready, and he sought to borrow £1000 of trust money that therewith a house for his own and his family's occupation might be erected. He had no money of his own. He granted a bond to the trustees for the £1000, and that bond is still a charge upon the property. Now, it seems to me to be for the interest of all that the question of liability should be at once determined, and that the trustees should be left to call up the loan, sell the property if the loan is not paid up, and should there be any deficiency, make up that deficiency to the trust-estate. That is beyond doubt the legal result, and it would only be to put off the evil day without advantage to anyone if the Court were to postpone its judgment and await the realisation of the property. With people like the pursuers the more strictly the course of legal procedure conformable to law is pursued the safer it will be for all concerned.

The next question relates to the purchase of stock of the American Telegraph Company. It appears not to have been a prosperous undertaking even when the trustees resolved to buy, and unfortunately for the trustees and the beneficiaries of the trust the value of the property did not improve. The consequence was that there was a loss of £1192, 17s. 10d. upon the buying and selling of the stock of this company. The question is whether this purchase was within the powers of the trustees. Ample powers are given to them—as ample as ever I saw for the investment of trust money; and truly the question is whether the purchase of the stock of a trading company is in the sense of law and in the sense of the trust-deed an investment. I am of opinion that it was not. I think it was a partnership in a company, and that the trustees became partners. The shares that were bought formed their contribution of the capital. But there can be no investment of money properly so called where the trustees become partners. In investing money the trustees remain outside of the company. Here the trustees joined the company, and so far as money was concerned, all that they did was to pay what was their stipulated share of the capital. Therefore, I am obliged to come to the conclusion that the purchase of these shares—the joining of the company by the trustees as partners—was a breach of trust. I regret extremely that I am obliged to come to this conclusion, but I see no escape from it, unless on considerations of sympathy with those who have been very ill used, and the law cannot be disregarded that wrong-doers like the pursuers here may not reap the benefit of their own discreditable conduct.

On the last part of the case, I have no difficulty. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the lending of money to the Scottish Amicable Securities Company was within the powers conferred by the truster on his trustees. I think there is no reasonable doubt on this subject. Judgment ought therefore to be pronounced to this effect.

The parties subsequently lodged a joint minute, stating that they had agreed to settle the case, and that they consented to the action being dismissed, without expenses to either party, and that they concurred in craving the Court to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, to dismiss the action, and to find neither party entitled to expenses.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"18th October 1888.—The Lords interpone authority to the joint minute for the parties, No. 74 of process, in terms thereof: Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of date 16th August 1887: Dismiss the action: Find no expenses due by either party to the other."

— July 20, 1888. Blair v. Hunters.

PATRICK BLAIR, Pursuer (Respondent).—Balfour—Low—Murray.
EVAN ALLAN HUNTER AND FRANK HUNTER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Darling—C. S. Dickson.

Partnership—Contract—Right to books of firm on dissolution—Senior resident partner.—A contract of copartnery was entered into between three Writers to the Signet in Edinburgh, C being the youngest partner. Article 5 of the contract provided that the partners should be bound to devote their whole time, so far as necessary, to the business, but with the exception that if C was appointed Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire he might give such time as was necessary to the duties of that office. Article 9 provided for the assumption of D as a partner on his becoming qualified to practise as a Writer to the Signet. Article 13 provided that on the dissolution of the firm the books should "belong to the senior resident partner at the time." C became Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire, and D was thereafter assumed as a partner in the firm. On the dissolution of the firm, C being then senior partner, D raised an action for declarator that he was entitled to the books of the firm as "senior resident partner." From a proof it appeared that C had his residence in Ayrshire, but that he also had a house in Edinburgh, at which he lived on an average three working days in the week, and that he took, when there, an active part in the management of the business. During the rest of the week he resided at his residence in Ayrshire. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that C was "resident" in Edinburgh within the meaning of the contract, and that, therefore, the books of the firm belonged to him.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Trayner. B.

MESSRS EVAN ALLAN HUNTER, PATRICK BLAIR, and FRANK HUNTER were the sole partners of the firm of Hunter, Blair, & Cowan, W.S., at the date of the dissolution of the firm on 31st July 1887.

On 28th October 1887 Mr Patrick Blair raised an action in the Court of Session against Mr Evan Hunter and Mr Frank Hunter, his junior partner, the conclusions of the summons being for declarator "that the whole business books of the now dissolved firm of Hunter, Blair, & Cowan, Writers to the Signet, Edinburgh, are now the sole and exclusive property of the pursuer, . . . and the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, conjunctly and severally, by decree foresaid, to deliver up to the pursuer the said books, to be retained and used by him as his sole and exclusive property as aforesaid, and that upon his granting an undertaking, in terms of the said contract of copartnery, to give full inspection of the same to the defenders when required by them."

It appeared from the record that in 1858 a contract of copartnery was entered into between Hugh Blair, W.S., David Cowan, W.S., and Evan Allan Hunter, W.S. (one of the defenders) by which it was agreed that the contracting parties should carry on the business of Writers to the Signet under the firm of Hunter, Blair, & Cowan, W.S. The contract was in thirteen heads, of which the important clauses for the purposes of this case were,—"Third, The profit and loss arising on the business from and after the said 31st day of July 1858 shall be divided into three equal shares, and each one-third shall be called a share.

"Fourth, The interest of the partners in the profit and loss shall be regulated by the number of shares held by each for the time when the same arises; and it is now agreed that each partner shall hold one share.

"Fifth, Each partner shall be bound to devote his whole time and attention to the management of this business, in so far as that may be necessary to its complete and speedy execution in all its departments, and none of the partners shall carry on any separate business for his individual behoof, except that, if Mr Evan Allan Hunter is appointed Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire, he may give such part of his time as is necessary to the duties of that office."

Blair v. Hunters.

"Ninth, It is hereby agreed that the said Hugh Blair shall be entitled to assume his son Patrick Blair into this copartnery, and to assign to him one-half of the share belonging to him the said Hugh Blair so soon as the said Patrick Blair is qualified to practise the profession of a Writer to the Signet, and that for the remainder of the contract. And further, in the event of the death of the said Hugh Blair during the currency of this copartnery, and before the said Patrick Blair has been assumed a partner, the said David Cowan and Evan Allan Hunter hereby agree, so soon as the said Patrick Blair is qualified as above, to assume him into this copartnery, and give him the half share to which he would have been entitled had he been assumed previously; and the said Patrick Blair, on being so assumed as a partner in either of the events foresaid, shall become bound and obliged in terms of all the stipulations and provisions herein contained."

"Thirteenth, At the elapse of the said seven years" (which was to be the term of endurance of the copartnery), "if none of the partners shall give intimation to the contrary in writing during the course of the previous year that the contract is to come to an end at the 31st day of July next, then it shall be held to go on for another year, and so on from year to year until such notice of dissolution shall be given; and at such dissolution, whether by the expiry of this contract or in any other event not before provided for, then the books of the concern shall belong to the senior resident partner at the time, who shall be bound to give full inspection of the same to the other partners when required."

When the contract was signed Mr E. A. Hunter was a candidate for the office of Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire, which was then vacant owing to the death of his father, who had been a partner of the firm of Hunter, Blair, & Cowan till the date of his death in 1858.

In 1860 Mr Patrick Blair (the pursuer in this case) was assumed a partner of the firm.

The firm of Hunter, Blair, & Cowan was first formed in 1843, when Mr Alexander Hunter, who was then sole partner of the previous firm, assumed Mr Hugh Blair, the pursuer's father, and Mr David Cowan as partners. In a deed of copartnery, dated in 1836, to which Mr Alexander Hunter was one of the parties (he being then Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire), there was a clause (similar to clause 13 quoted above) stipulating that on the dissolution of the firm the books of the firm should belong to the "senior resident partner." This clause was repeated in the contract of copartnery in 1843.

In all the deeds entered into after the contract of 1858, including the deeds of assumption of Mr Patrick Blair, and of Mr Frank Hunter (the second defender) in 1882, the incoming partners became bound by all the stipulations in the contract of 1858.

At the date of the dissolution of the firm Mr Evan Hunter was the senior partner, Mr Patrick Blair the second, and Mr Frank Hunter the third partner.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 8) "By the Act 6 George IV. cap. 23, section 6, it is enacted that 'every person who has been appointed since the first day of August 1814, or who shall hereafter be appointed a clerk in the said Sheriff or Stewart Courts, shall discharge the duties of the said office personally.' The duties of Sheriff-clerk are of a varied and onerous character, demanding much time and personal attention, and frequent attendance in Court. The defender Evan Allan Hunter has, since his appointment, resided in Ayrshire, where he has maintained, and now maintains, a large establishment." (Cond. 9) "The pursuer has all along been, and at the date of the dissolution of the firm, was resident in Edinburgh. At the dissolution he was within the meaning of the original articles or contract 'the senior resident partner' of the firm."

The defenders averred,—(Stat. 3) "The defender Mr Evan Allan Hunter has always been senior to the pursuer in the said firms. The defender Mr Evan Allan Hunter was at the date of dissolution the senior resident partner of the firm in question, in the sense of the contract of copartnery, and in terms thereof the books belong to the defender Evan Allan Hunter, who is willing to give inspection thereof to the pursuer as provided by the contract. The said defender has for some years rented a country house in Ayrshire, in which county the estates of the most important clients of the late firm (including those of the Marquess of Ailsa) were situated, but he has all along had a house in Edinburgh, where he has personally resided; his present house in Edinburgh is at No. 11 Maitland Street, where he resides, and of which he has a lease. He has his own servants in this house, and the furniture in it belongs to him."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—The pursuer having been the senior resident partner of the firm at the time of the dissolution thereof, the books thereof belong to him in terms of the original articles or contract of copartnery and subsequent minutes, and he is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender, Evan Allan Hunter, having been at the date of dissolution the senior resident partner in the sense of the contract, the defenders should be assoilzied.

Proof was led in the cause. The evidence necessary to be quoted turned chiefly on the question as to Mr Hunter's places of residence during the subsistence of the partnership. On this point Mr Evan Hunter's evidence is given below.* States were put into process shewing the number of

* "I believe the clause of the contract under which the question arises did not appear for the first time in the contract of 1858; the same clause appeared in the contracts of 1836 and 1843. I continued a partner of the firm continuously from 1848 till the dissolution at 31st July last. I took rooms in Edinburgh when I gave up Cameron House in 1859. Previous to that I had resided with my father at Cameron House and at Drum. The first rooms I took were at 130 Princes Street and afterwards at 121 Princes Street. (Q.) And there you resided until Whitsunday 1874? (A.) Yes. I resided longer than that in Princes Street, but at Whitsunday 1874 I became tenant of the house No. 121 instead of a lodger. Since then I have had a house in Edinburgh continuously. The furniture and the servants have been mine since 1874, both in the house in Princes Street and at 11 Maitland Street. (Q.) And from that period you have resided in those two houses? (A.) I have. I have also, during that time, had houses in Ayrshire on lease,—first Belmont, then Adamton, and now Newark Castle. (Shewn No. 17)—That is the lease under which I hold Newark. For some years back it has been my custom to leave Edinburgh on Friday and return the following Tuesday. Sometimes I left on the Friday morning and sometimes in the afternoon. I arrived in Edinburgh about six o'clock on the Tuesday evening. It was my practice to have the letter-book of the firm sent to my house on the Tuesday evening, so that I might see what had been doing in my absence. When I left Edinburgh on the Friday afternoon I left by the 4.30 train. That was my rule all through when I was in good health. I very seldom took a holiday—never in fact. My practice varied sometimes a day or two; sometimes I would leave Ayr on Monday and stay in Edinburgh till Saturday. By the Court.—Sometimes I did not come to Edinburgh all week. Examined.—Sometimes I was in Edinburgh from Monday or Tuesday of one week to Thursday or Friday of the following week. If Mr Blair was away I did that more frequently. When I was in Ayrshire I occasionally wrote letters on the business of the firm and sent them to Edinburgh to be booked. I also had meetings on business matters connected with the firm;

days which Mr Evan Hunter and Mr Blair attended at the office respectively on an average during the year. It is sufficient to state that the state shewed that Mr Blair was at the office much more regularly than Mr Hunter, who was absent at Ayr on an average three of the working days of the week.

On 7th February 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced an interlocutor decerning in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

I met Lord Ailsa's factor, and Mr Shaw, who was factor for Mr Macadam of Craigengillan. These were two considerable clients of the firm. I took special charge of their affairs. It was not my habit to sign many letters which had not been dictated or written by me. (Q.) You rather left the signing of letters to the other partners of the firm? (A.) Yes. A great many letters were written by responsible clerks. I have held the office of Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire since 1858. There is nothing in my commission requiring me to live in the county. There have been Sheriff-clerk-deputes at Ayr and Kilmarnock all my time. The Court days at Ayr are on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and at Kilmarnock on Wednesdays and Thursdays. By the Court.—(Q.) So that, if the Sheriff insisted on it, you would require to be in Ayr on three days of the week? (A.) If he had the power. Examination continued.—I have given such attendance as Sheriff-clerk as I have been asked to give. There have been Sheriff-clerk-deputes not merely during my time, but ever since the passing of the Act of George the Fourth. That applies to Ayr; and there has been a depute at Kilmarnock ever since the county was divided into two districts. Under my tack of Newark Castle I pay £160 for the house and £140 for the shootings. I have not been in the way of shooting much—comparatively little. I have the shooting chiefly for the use of my friends. Since 1848 I have regularly held an attorney's licence for Edinburgh. I have always been on the register of voters for Edinburgh."

* "OPINION.—The firm of Hunter, Blair, & Cowan, which has been long established in Edinburgh, was dissolved on 31st July 1887, at which time the defender Mr Evan Allan Hunter was senior partner, and Mr Patrick Blair, the pursuer, was second in seniority.

"Mr Blair brings this action to have it declared that he is entitled to the whole business books of the now dissolved firm as his property, undertaking that access to the books shall be given to any other partner of the firm who may require to consult them. Mr Blair's right to the books is based upon a clause of the contract which he quotes in condescendence 6:—'At such dissolution, whether by the expiry of this contract or in any other event not before provided for, then the books of the concern shall belong to the senior resident partner, who shall be bound to give full inspection of the same to the other partners when required.'

"The title to the books, therefore, is in the senior resident partner of the concern at the time of dissolution; and the whole question is, who was the senior resident partner at that time. The meaning of the clause in the contract of copartnery is one regarding which different opinions may be entertained. If I dealt with that clause as meaning merely 'the senior partner resident in Edinburgh at the time of the dissolution,' I should be of opinion that the description applied more correctly to Mr Blair than Mr Hunter, because, although Mr Hunter had undoubtedly rooms, or a house—a small house—in Edinburgh at that time, his residence in the popular and proper sense of the term was undoubtedly in Ayrshire. His family was there, his establishment was there, he resorted there, if I may say so, whenever he could. It was the chief seat of his residence. His rooms or house in Edinburgh were rather of the character of temporary accommodation than a residence. But the question, I think, is a little different, from merely where the senior partner's residence was at the time of the dissolution. I think we must look at the three words together, "senior resident partner." My impression of the reading of that clause is that senior resident partner means that partner senior in the firm who was chiefly to be found at the seat of the firm's business, who was constantly in attendance upon

Blair v. Hunters.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The test in this action was,—Was Mr Evan Hunter disqualified from obtaining possession of the books by non-residence, there being no doubt that he was senior partner at the time of the dissolution? Mr Hunter personally carried on the business in Edinburgh, he was there three out of the six working days of the week, and besides, did some of the business of the firm (that connected with the firm's agency for Lord Ailsa) when he was at Ayr. A man could have two residences, though he could only have one domicile,[1] and Mr Hunter had a residence in Edinburgh, which he kept up for the sole purpose of taking a share in the firm's work. His residence in Ayr was a residence of pleasure, that in Edinburgh a residence of business. A competitive examination as to whether the junior partner had been more regular in his attendance at the office than the senior could never form a test as to whether the latter was "resident" or not. Residence was not required of a sheriff-clerk, he could do his work, if necessary, by deputy.[2]

The clause with regard to the books could not have been intended to strike specially at Mr Hunter (1) because it occurred in the older contracts, which had been entered into by Alexander Hunter when he was senior or sole partner of the firm, and it could not be supposed that he would knowingly and voluntarily contract himself out of so valuable a right as that of the custody of the books, when all he had to do was to make his own terms; (2) because under the contract of 1858, by which Mr Evan Hunter entered as junior partner, he could never become senior partner at all. He might have become sole, but never senior partner. That contract must be looked at as at the date and under the circumstances of its signing.

Argued for the respondent;—The deed must be examined to see whether other parts of it threw light on the meaning of the word "resident." The partners under the deed were bound to devote their whole time to the business, and it was not contemplated that the senior partner should have another business which would take him away very much from Edinburgh. The office of sheriff-clerk under the statute required residence in the county. It was to meet the case of Mr Evan Hunter that article 13 was inserted in the contract, and that article was explained by article 5. The facts shewed that Mr Hunter's real residence was in Ayrshire. The argument that Mr Hunter could never have become senior partner under the contract of 1858 was met by clause 9, which provided for the assumption of another and junior partner.

Lord President.—This question is, I think, not unattended with difficulty. At first sight there is a good deal of plausibility in the view the Lord Ordinary has taken, but on full consideration, and after hearing a very good argument on both sides of the question, I have come to an opposite conclusion from that of the Lord Ordinary.

the business, exercising his skill and occupying his time in its supervision. If that is a correct definition, then the only person who falls within it is Mr Blair. For while undoubtedly Mr Hunter was coming to the office two, or it may be for three days a-week, and giving some attention to business, the resident partner, in the sense I have just stated, was undoubtedly Mr Blair. He was not there for two days a-week; he was there every day of the week, and attending to the business of the office every day of the week. That being my view of the clause, I think Mr Blair is entitled to take the books, and I decern in terms of the conclusion of the summons."

[1] Lloyd v. Inland Revenue, March 12, 1884, 11 R. 687.

[2] Heddle v. Garioch, March 1, 1827, 5 S. 503; Dove Wilson on Sheriff Court Practice, p. 44.

The contract in question was entered into in 1858. Mr Alexander Hunter, the father of the defender, was then dead, and Mr Evan Hunter and the other partners acting with him under a previous arrangement entered into a new contract. The senior partner under this contract was Mr Hugh Blair, Mr David Cowan was the second, and Mr Evan Allan Hunter was the junior. The contract provided that the profit and loss on the business should be divided into equal shares, each partner having a share. It was provided by the fifth article:—"Each partner shall be bound to devote his whole time and attention to the management of this business, in so far as that may be necessary to its complete and speedy execution in all its departments, and none of the partners shall carry on any separate business for his individual behoof, except that, if Mr Evan Allan Hunter is appointed Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire, he may give such part of his time as is necessary to the duties of that office,"—the exception in favour of Mr Evan Hunter being made in consequence of his expecting to be made Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire.

The clause on which the controversy arises is the 13th. That clause provides,—"At the elapse of the said seven years, if none of the partners shall give intimation to the contrary in writing during the course of the previous year that the contract is to come to an end at the 31st day of July next, then it shall be held to go on for another year and so on from year to year, until such notice of dissolution shall be given; and at such dissolution, whether by the expiry of this contract, or in any other event not before provided for, then the books of the concern shall belong to the senior resident partner at the time, who shall be bound to give full inspection of the same to the other partners when required."

It is contended by the pursuers that that clause has special reference back to clause 5, which gives Mr Hunter his dispensation from constant attention at the office in order to enable him to discharge his duties at Ayr. I think there is no necessary connection between the two. The argument advanced by Mr Darling is not displaced by that contention because, under the contract of 1858, it is demonstrable that Mr Evan Hunter could never become the senior resident partner of the firm, he having entered into the partnership as junior partner, and so long as the contract remained undisturbed the possibility of Mr Hunter becoming entitled to the books of the firm was removed. But it is said, and there is some weight in the suggestion, that there was in gremio of the deed a power of expansion, that another partner might be brought in, and that then Mr Hunter might become senior resident partner. That is true, for there is a stipulation that Mr Hugh Blair might assume his son, Mr Patrick Blair, as a partner. That stipulation was not, however, to take immediate effect; it was a future event that was contemplated, and was merely an arrangement, not for a redistribution of the business, but only for giving off a part of Mr Hugh Blair's share to his son. Therefore, although after that assumption took place it became possible that Mr Hunter should become senior partner, it was not possible under the original circumstances in which the contract was entered into. I think we must construe the contract with reference to the time at which it was executed, and therefore I say that there is no necessary connection between clauses 5 and 13. We must, therefore, construe clause 13 in a reasonable way, and with reference to the circumstances of the existing partners and the relations between them.

Now, it is said that Mr Evan Hunter is not resident, and is therefore disqualified from getting the books as senior partner. The word "resident" certainly admits of construction. It cannot mean that the senior partner must be constantly resident in one place, and the Lord Ordinary himself suggests something more important than that, namely, the amount of time which he devotes to the business. That is undoubtedly an element in the question, but what strikes me as very important is that Mr Hunter has not only a residence in Edinburgh, but that that residence was established and was kept up by him for the purpose of enabling him to attend to the business. There is no other object for which he can be said to have kept it up, because it is perfectly plain that if it had not been necessary for that purpose he would have had no residence here at all. His residence of choice was undoubtedly in Ayrshire, and that was obviously his home, but his residence in Edinburgh was a business residence as distinguished from a residence for pleasure and enjoyment. That is very important in construing this contract. If he took this house in Edinburgh only because he was carrying on business there, and so as to enable him to do so, how can he in the sense of this contract be said not to be a resident?

No doubt it is said, with some force, that his attendance at the office was not so constant as that of Mr Blair, but that may be quite accounted for by the fact that it was to enable him not to be always at the office that he obtained his dispensation from constant attendance under the contract of copartnery.

If I could read the 13th clause as referring back to the 5th, the force of that answer would be taken off, for then it might be contended that the fact of the dispensation being obtained showed that Mr Hunter was looked upon as being non-resident; but, as I have said, I think the clauses have no connection with one another.

Now, if a gentleman entitled to spend his time in Ayr is still an acting partner of a firm in Edinburgh, devoting to that business as much time weekly as is consistent with his official duties in Ayr, or as is necessary for that business, and if he has a house in Edinburgh for the express purpose of enabling him to carry on his business there, I cannot say that he is a non-resident partner. I think, therefore, we ought to alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and assoilzie the defender.

LORD MURE.—I concur. The question depends entirely on the construction of the contract of 1858. It is admitted that the senior partner is Mr Hunter, and that he has taken a house permanently in Edinburgh, and lives there for three out of the working days in the week. It is said, however, that in consequence of his duties as Sheriff-clerk of Ayr he has to be resident there, but while he is there he still has his residence in Edinburgh, and it is specially arranged under the contract that he is to be allowed to be at Ayr for "such part of his time as is necessary to the duties of that office." The complaint that is made is, that because he discharges the duties of his office and is in Ayr for three working days in the week, he cannot be said to be resident in Edinburgh. I cannot take that view. In one sense Mr Hunter has two residences, and a man may certainly have two or even more residences at one time. Mr Hunter has taken a house in Edinburgh simply to enable him to act as a partner in this firm, and he lives in Edinburgh so many days in the week. He is therefore, I think, fairly within the meaning of the words "senior resident partner."

LORD SHAND.—"Resident" is an unusual term to find in a contract of this kind as applied to the partners, and I was at first disposed to find an explanation of it in the provisions of sec. 5 of the contract, in which Mr Hunter's prospect of being appointed Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire is referred to. Any impression made on me by that section was, however, removed by Mr Darling pointing out that when the contract was entered into Mr Hunter was the junior partner. Clause 13th could not have been meant to affect him, for he could never become senior partner under that contract. The other two partners were the only persons who could ever become senior partners in that copartnery. The only way in which that point has been met is by saying that this was a provision intended to meet the case of Mr Patrick Blair afterwards becoming a partner. I cannot, however, accept that suggestion, and I therefore take up the question on the footing that there is nothing in the contract to shew the meaning of the word "resident." We are therefore thrown back on this, How ought that word to be construed in any contract of copartnery of professional men? I think it is clear that we cannot adopt the Lord Ordinary's view that we are to measure the work done by the partners, and take the one who does most as the resident partner. That is not a test of residence at all. The word "resident" has reference to the place in which the partner is living, not to the amount of work he is doing. The question then comes to be, has Mr Hunter resided in Edinburgh? I can only answer that question in the affirmative, and as he is undoubtedly the senior partner, so I think he is the senior resident partner. It cannot be made a question which of the partners resides most in Edinburgh. Each is resident, though Mr Blair may reside more in Edinburgh in the course of the year than Mr Hunter does. It may be that Mr Hunter has not done so much work for the firm as Mr Blair. But residence is the test, not the amount of work done, and senior partners often do not do so much work as their juniors. I have come in the end to be clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has come to a wrong conclusion.

Lord Adam.—The question for us is, what is the meaning of the expression "senior resident partner"? The senior partner must have a residence somewhere near, but it is admitted that it need not be actually in Edinburgh, and it is suggested that the residence must be so near as to make attention to business possible. Now, the mere fact of having a residence in or near Edinburgh would not be enough; that would not make the partner "resident"; but Mr Hunter not only has a house in Edinburgh, but he occupies it, or resides in it, for a sufficient length of time weekly to enable him to take an active part in the work of the firm. To enable him to do that is the purpose for which Mr Hunter has a house in Edinburgh at all, and I therefore think it is impossible to say that he is not a resident partner. He resides here for a part of every week, and takes an active part in the business.

I only wish to add that the Lord Ordinary has not taken a right view of the case when he tried to solve the question by investigating as to which of the partners gave the most attention to the business. The question of residence cannot, I think, be solved in that way.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defenders.

CATHERINE WALKER AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Macfarlane.
JOHN BUCHANAN (Walker's Judicial Factor), Respondent.—J. A. Reid.

Judicial Factor—Recall of appointment—Failure to lodge accounts and vouchers.—A petition was presented by Mrs Catherine Main or Walker or Smith and others, beneficiaries under the trust-settlement of the late Robert Walker, for the removal of John Buchanan, judicial factor on the trust-estate, on the ground that his annual accounts had not been duly lodged, and when lodged were found to be neither intelligible nor complete. The Court appointed the factor to lodge a detailed account of his outlays for the four years ending 30th November 1887. Detailed accounts were subsequently produced by the factor, with vouchers, certain of which appeared to have been altered so as to represent receipts for larger sums than had been originally represented by them. The factor declined to resign, except on the footing that his accounts should first be approved of.

The Court, after looking at the vouchers, and being satisfied that they had been tampered with, recalled the factor's appointment, and remitted the cause to the Junior Lord Ordinary, with instructions to appoint a judicial factor in room of the said John Buchanan, and to proceed with the accounting.

Redding v. Redding.

MRS MARGARET MACKINLAY OR REDDING, Pursuer.—G. R. Gillespie.
ROBERT REDDING, Defender.

Jurisdiction—Husband and Wife—Divorce for desertion—Foreign.—A Scotswoman married an Englishman and resided with him in England for about ten years. The husband having deserted his wife and gone to America, she returned to reside in Scotland. In an action brought by her there for divorce on the ground of desertion, held by Lord M'Laren (Ordinary) that the Court had no jurisdiction over the defender, and that the action was incompetent.

Outer-House
Lord M'Laren.

IN 1869 Robert Redding, an Englishman, who had been for four years an officer of excise in Edinburgh, married there Margaret Mackinlay, a Scotswoman. Six months after the marriage, Redding removed to England, where he resided with his wife till February 1880, when he deserted her and went to New York.

Mrs Redding, in 1880, returned to Edinburgh, where she lived with her mother, a widow, and supported herself and her children by her own industry.

In January 1888 Mrs Redding raised an action of divorce, on the ground of desertion, against her husband.

No defences were lodged.

After a proof, the import of which is given in the Lord Ordinary's note, his Lordship heard the pursuer's counsel on the question of jurisdiction.

Argued for the pursuer;—The wife's domicile in cases of desertion did not follow that of the husband, for it was matter of every-day practice to entertain actions of divorce when the husband had transferred his domicile to a foreign country—Fraser on Husband and Wife, p. 1212. If, then, the wife had a capacity to retain a domicile separate from that of her husband, why should she not acquire a new domicile to the same effect? The desertion began in England, but the husband was now in desertion, and the wife was entitled to appeal to the Court of the country in which she was resident animo remanendi to redress the wrong which her husband day by day continued to inflict upon her. All the text writers agreed on the competency of this,—Fraser, 1254; Phillimore, iv. 346; Wharton, sec. 224; Bishop, ii. sec. 128; Bar, sec. 92; Story, 229a—and although there was no decided cases to that effect in this country, America supplied cases—Bishop, loc. cit., and Story, loc. cit. Unless this were so the wife had no forum to which she could resort, for she did not know where her husband was, and the doctrine of "matrimonial domicile" was now exploded—Pitt v. Pitt, April 6, 1864, 2 Macph. (H. of L.) 28; Wilson v. Wilson, L. R., 2 P. and D. 435; Stavert v. Stavert, February 3, 1882, 9 R. 519. That the remedy of divorce for desertion was unknown in the country in which the spouses had lived as married persons was immaterial if Scotland was bona fide adopted as a domicile by the pursuer—Carswell v. Carswell, July 6, 1881, 8 R. 901.

* Decided July 17, 1888. † Decided March 22, 1888.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session; therefore dismisses the action, and decerns." *

---

* "NOTE.—This is an action at the instance of the wife, concluding for a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of desertion. The desertion is clearly proved, and the only question is whether the Court of Session has jurisdiction over the spouses in the matter of the action. The proof was taken before me on the 10th inst., and in her examination the pursuer stated that her husband was born in Berwick-on-Tweed, and that both his parents were Scotch and had lived in Scotland before his birth. But as the pursuer was not professing to speak from personal knowledge or family tradition (because the question is as to the domicile of the husband's parents) I adjourned the proof in order that further evidence might be obtained on this point. On the case being called on the 20th inst., counsel for the pursuer stated that certain members of the husband's family had been communicated with, but that he could not say that their evidence would support the allegation that the husband's parents were of Scottish extraction. The case was accordingly argued on the assumption that the defender, Mr Redding, was not only born in England, but that England was his domicile of origin.

"The next question of fact is, whether at the time when the defender deserted his wife he had come to be domiciled in Scotland. The facts are these:—For a period of four years prior to the marriage the defender had resided in Edinburgh, where he had a situation in the Inland Revenue Office. The Edinburgh residence was continued after the marriage for a period less than a year, terminating in 1870; the spouses then resided in Devonshire for three years; and after a short stay in London settled in Cambridgeshire, where the defender held the position of superintendent of police. Here the spouses remained from 1874 to 1880, when the defender left his wife and went abroad. It appears to me that if I were to conclude that a Scottish domicile was acquired by reason of the defender's residence in Edinburgh for five years, I must also conclude that the English domicile was reacquired by the subsequent residence of the spouses in England for ten years. The character of the residence was the same in both cases, and the result is either that the defender must be taken to have retained his domicile of origin from the beginning until the act of desertion was committed, or if he had at one time acquired a Scottish domicile, that he reacquired his English domicile by accepting a permanent situation there, and was in fact domiciled in England at the time when he deserted the pursuer. Since 1880 the pursuer has been resident in Edinburgh, and she regards Scotland as her present domicile, and claims to sue for a divorce on grounds recognised by the law of Scotland.

"The question is, as I have said, whether this Court has jurisdiction. It has come to be authoritatively settled that the jurisdiction of the Court in actions of divorce is founded on the domicile of the spouses; because a divorce is a proceeding which affects the status of the spouses, and ought only to be granted by a Judge who has universal jurisdiction over the parties. In general this will be a universal jurisdiction over both spouses, because of the rule that the wife's domicile follows that of the husband. There is, however, in my opinion an exception to this rule, because I agree in the opinion expressed by Lord Westbury in Pitt v. Pitt, 2 Macph. 32, to the effect that after a cause of action has arisen the husband is not entitled by changing his domicile to subject his wife to the jurisdiction of the Courts of a foreign country, or to bring her under the dominion of a system of positive law to which she is a stranger. From this consideration it would follow that Mr Redding by settling in America could not subject his wife to an action at his instance in an American Court, or oblige her to seek redress for the wrong he had done in the Courts of America. For the purposes of adjudicating on any question of conjugal right I conceive that the Courts of England remain open to Mrs Redding, notwithstanding her husband's disappearance; and her remedy (possibly an imperfect one) is such as the laws of England confer on a deserted wife. These considerations are evidently antagonistic to the wife's claim in the present case to prosecute a divorce suit in Scotland. If the husband is not entitled to change the jurisdiction against the wife, it follows in my opinion that the wife has not the power by her change of residence to create a new jurisdiction against the husband. It is quite certain that the Court of Session has not a universal jurisdiction against the defender in this case. (1) To sustain the jurisdiction in respect of the wife's election to fix her domicile here (supposing that she has the power to do so) would, I apprehend, be tantamount to a revival of the old system of founding consistorial jurisdiction on special grounds applicable to one of the parties. (2) In general, when jurisdiction is founded ratione domicilii, it is the defender's domicile that is alone considered. Here the domicile founded on is that of the pursuer. This is another objection. But (3) the determining consideration in my mind is that the Court which is to make a decree dissolving a marriage ought to have jurisdiction over both parties. Where one of the spouses has wrongfully withdrawn from the country, it may not unreasonably be held that the jurisdiction against him or her is not destroyed by the party's own wrongful act. It is matter of familiar practice that this Court grants decrees of divorce against deserting spouses who have quitted the country finally to all appearance, and whose place of residence may even be unknown. If in such a case the husband is the pursuer, his wife's domicile is not changed by her desertion. If the wife is the pursuer, we act on the principle that the husband cannot by his own wrong change the joint domicile to the prejudice of the wife. But these rules do not appear to have any application to a case where the husband's last known domicile is England, and where the wife is not seeking to maintain the status quo, but to set in motion the Courts of a country which she claims to have chosen as her domicile, but to which it cannot be shewn that her husband owes obedience."

1. A landed proprietor having become insane, his brother, without judicial or other authority, managed his estate with the assistance of the law-agents who had previously managed the estate for the proprietor. After two years a curator bonis was appointed to the proprietor. In an action of accounting brought by the curator against the law-agents, the pursuer maintained that the defenders must be regarded as pro-curators, and were not entitled to credit for professional charges. Held that the law-agents were entitled to the ordinary remuneration for their services. through the transaction, on the ground that the defender had failed to communicate to the pursuer the fact that he had ascertained that the patent could not be relied on as valid without further inquiry than had been made, and had allowed him to advance his money in ignorance of this risk, held (rev. judgment of First Division) (1) that the onus of proving that the communication had not been made lay upon the pursuer; and (2) on the proof (diss. the Lord Chancellor) that the pursuer had failed to discharge himself of this onus, and that from the facts proved and documents produced it was to be inferred that B did make the communication to his client. M'Clure, Naismith, Brodie, & Macfarlane v. Stewart, July 22, 1887, H. L., p. 1.

Liability of agent—Trust—Investment—Title to sue—Beneficiary with contingent interest.

4. While both spouses were alive the children of a marriage, whose interest under their parent's marriage-contract was during the marriage contingent merely, brought an action against the marriage-contract trustees and the law-agent to the trust, "conjunctly and severally, or severally, or in such other way or manner as should seem just," to have them ordained to restore money alleged to have been lost to the trust through investment on insufficient security. The law-agent and one of the trustees lodged defences. The Court—while unanimously of opinion on a proof that the security was one which ought not to have been accepted by trustees—(diss. Lord Mure, Lord Shand, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark) assoilzied the trustee, and (diss. Lord Young) assoilzied the law-agent.

The Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Shand, Rutherfurd Clark, and Adam, held that the pursuers had no title to sue the law-agent, (1) because he was not employed by them, and (2) because they might never become entitled to the trust-estate, and would in that event suffer no damage.

Lords Mure and Shand were of opinion that there was no liability, even assuming a title to sue, because a law-agent is not responsible for the sufficiency of a security, unless there is a special undertaking to that effect, which was not alleged in the present case.

Lord Young was of opinion that as all the parties were before the Court the liability of the law-agent should be determined in the present action, and, on the evidence, that there had been a failure of duty on his part, and that he was liable. Rae v. Meek, July 20, 1888, p. 1033.

Competency—Question of Irish law not considered in Court of Session.

2. In an action brought in the Court of Session by the widow of a Scotsman against her husband's testamentary trustees for reduction of an antenuptial contract of marriage signed by her in Ireland, by which she renounced for a small annuity her terce and jus relictæ, the pursuer averred that according to the law of Ireland she was an infant, and pleaded (1) minority; (2) lesion. After a proof, in which no evidence was led as to the law of Ireland, the Court found that the pursuer had failed to instruct lesion, and assoilzied the defenders. In an appeal to the House of Lords the pursuer contended that the marriage-contract should be reduced, on the ground that, by the law of Ireland, the pursuer being a minor had not the capacity to enter into a contract. The defenders objected to the competency of raising this plea, on the ground that no evidence had been laid before the Scottish Court as to the law of Ireland, that the proof was closed, and that it was not open to the Held that although the question as to the law of Ireland was a question of fact for the Court of Session, the House could dispose of it as a question of law; and that by the law of Ireland the pursuer, as a minor, had not the capacity to enter into the contract, which was therefore invalid. Cooper v. Cooper, Feb. 24, 1888, H. L., p. 21.

Appeal in forma pauperis—Public Right.

ARBITRATION. Lease—Reference to man of skill—Power to take evidence.

1. In a reduction of a decreet-arbitral following upon a reference to two men of skill as arbiters under a lease as to the value of a waygoing crop, the pursuer averred that parties were not heard, that only one of the arbiters had seen the crop after it had been cut, and that no evidence had been led as to its value. Held that no relevant ground for reduction had been stated, and action dismissed.

   Observed that it would have been incompetent to lead evidence. Logan v. Leadbetter, Dec. 6, 1887, p. 115.

Reference to unnamed arbiter—Person holding an office for the time being.

2. Held that a clause of reference referring "any question that may arise as to the meaning or intent of this contract" to "the engineer of the F. B. Railway Company, for the time being" was ineffectual, in respect there was no nomination of a referee inferring a delectus personæ on the part of the contracting parties. Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co., Dec. 22, 1887, p. 215.

Process—Diligence for citing havers.

3. Where one of the parties to an arbitration presented a petition to the Court for warrant to cite witnesses to appear before a commissioner and produce documents conform to specification annexed, the Court refused the petition, holding that the approval of the arbiters to the specification ought first to have been obtained. Crichton v. North British Railway Co., June 26, 1888, p. 784.

4. Suspension of appointment by Sheriff of referee under the above Act on the ground of excess of jurisdiction. Sinclair v. Clyne's Trustees, Dec. 7, 1887, p. 185.

1. By antenuptial marriage-contract a lady who, with her husband, was domiciled in Germany, conveyed her whole estate, including acquirenda, to trustees, of whom her brother was one, for behoof of herself and her children. She subsequently succeeded to a legacy, which was arrested ad fundandam jurisdictionem in the hands of the representative of the donor (to whom the marriage-contract trust had not been intimated), by the trustee on her brother's sequestrated estate, for a debt alleged to be due by her to the latter. Held (diss. Lord Shand) that the arrestments were bad, as the trustee had no higher right than the bankrupt, who could not have benefited by his failure to intimate the marriage-contract trust to the testamentary trustee to the prejudice of the beneficiaries under the trust, whose interests it was his duty to protect. Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg, June 1, 1888, p. 691.
2. To found jurisdiction by arrestment it is not necessary that the letters should be executed before the summons is signeted. Wall's Trustees v. Drynan, Feb. 1, 1888, p. 359.

Recall—Wages Arrestment Limitation Act, 1870.

3. Wages which were held exempted from arrestment by the above Act. M'Murchy v. Emslie & Guthrie, Feb. 4, 1888, p. 375.

Recall—Labourer with precarious income—Aliment.

4. A colliery labourer was entitled to a payment of 12s. per week from his father's estate for his alimentary use allenarly. Owing to an accident he was unable to earn a full wage, but was in receipt of about 12s. per week for his work in the pits. His employment was, however, precarious in respect of his state of health. In an action brought by him in the Court of Session he was unsuccessful, and the defenders obtained decree for expenses. Following thereon they arrested money due to him from his father's estate in the hands of the trustees. The Court in the circumstances recalled the arrestments. Dick v. Russell, Dec. 24, 1887, p. 261.

Recall—Enforcement of order of English Court—Companies Act, 1862.

5. A having used arrestments to found jurisdiction, raised an action against a company in Queensland, and on the dependence arrested sums due to the company in the hands of its shareholders in Scotland. The Queensland Company went into liquidation in Queensland, and subsequently applied for and obtained a winding-up order in London, where it had assets and creditors. The English liquidator then obtained from the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice an order restraining A from further prosecuting the action in Scotland, but bearing, "this order is to be without prejudice to the security, if any, upon the amounts payable by the Scotch shareholders which" A "has acquired by the proceedings taken in Scotland." The order further directed that the amounts received from Scottish shareholders in respect of a call should be placed to a separate account. The Court, in applications by the liquidator, granted an order restraining A from proceeding with the action, but subject to the orders of the Court, although at the same time they held such an order to be unnecessary, and granted the petition for recall of the arrestments, holding that the terms of the order by the Court of Chancery prevented the respondent from being prejudiced. Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co., Limited, v. Australasian Investment Co., Limited, July 17, 1888, p. 935.

BANKRUPTCY. Effect of bankruptcy—Act, 1621, cap. 18—Cash payment.

1. A trader employed his daughter as a saleswoman in December 1883. In December 1885, being insolvent, he attempted unsuccessfully to compound with his creditors. Thereafter the daughter, at a time when she believed sequestration to be imminent, obtained from him payments amounting to £69 as the alleged amount of two years' wages. On 10th March 1886 the trader was sequestrated. In an action by the trustee for repetition of the amount paid to the daughter as a fraudulent preference, held that the pursuer was entitled to repetition,—the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill holding, that assuming the alleged debt to be due to the defender, the payment was a fraudulent preference; Lord Craighill further holding with Lord Rutherfurd Clark that the resting owing of the alleged debt had not been proved. Jones' Trustee v. Jones, Jan. 25, 1888, p. 328.

Effect of bankruptcy—Act 1621, c. 18—Conveyance by insolvent.

2. A father who was insolvent, and had no other property than the furniture of a lodging-house, conveyed the furniture to his daughter on the narrative that she had for fifteen years acted as his housekeeper without remuneration. A creditor of the father, whose debt existed at the date of the conveyance, obtained decree for his debt and poinded the furniture. In a petition for interdict presented by the daughter against the sale of the furniture, the only evidence adduced by her in proof of her claim against her father was her own testimony to the effect that she had acted as a domestic servant to him for fifteen years without wages. Held that she had failed to prove that the disposition by her father to her had been granted for a just and necessary cause, and interdict refused. Dawson v. Thorburn, July 12, 1888, p. 891.

Effect of bankruptcy—Cessio—Cash payment by insolvent.

3. A petition was presented in the Sheriff Court to ordain A, a farmer, to grant a disposition omnium bonorum under the Cessio Acts. On 28th September, the Sheriff, on the narrative that he was satisfied that there was prima facie evidence of A's notour bankruptcy, ordained him to lodge a state of his affairs by 6th October. On 30th September, A granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. He did not lodge the state required by the deliverance, but on 7th October he sold part of his stock, and paid the proceeds to a firm of merchants in payment of an account due by him to them. The merchants were at the date at which the payment was made aware of A's insolvency, that the petition for cessio had been presented, and the first order pronounced thereon. In a question between the trustee and the firm of merchants held that the trustee was entitled to repetition of the amount paid to them in respect of their debt. Shaw's Trustee v. Stewart & Bisset, Nov. 15, 1887, p. 32.

Effect of bankruptcy—Preference—Uncompleted Security—Right to assignation of rates and duties.

4. The Greenock Harbour Trustees were authorised by their Acts to borrow money, and in security therefor to grant assignations of the rates and duties leviable by the trust. Some of the creditors of the trust held only interim receipts for their advances signed by the treasurer of the trust, with an undertaking that an assignment would afterwards be completed. The trustees became unable to meet all their liabilities. A question of preference between the holders of the statutory assignations and the holders of the interim receipts having arisen, held that creditors holding assignations granted in terms of the statute had a preference over the interim receipt holders, who held no statutory security. Greenock Harbour Trustees, Jan. 31, 1888, p. 343.

Sequestration—Trustee—Election—Appeal—Competency—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 71.

5. At a meeting of creditors for the election of a trustee in a sequestration, creditors to the value of £15,000 voted for A and creditors to the value of £1600 voted for B. Objections were taken by creditors to certain votes for A. The Sheriff-substitute sustained an objection to the vote of X, a creditor for £16, who had proposed A, and, on the ground that A had been proposed by a creditor who was not entitled to vote, declared B to have been duly elected. An appeal by A to the Court of Session was objected to on the ground that by sec. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act the Sheriff's judgment was final. Held that the appeal was competent, and that the interlocutor must be recalled, on the ground that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction—the Lord President holding that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in failing to ascertain the number of valid votes for each candidate—Lord Shand holding that the Sheriff's jurisdiction was limited to disposing of objections stated to him—Lord Adam concurring on both grounds. Farquharson v. Sutherlands, June 16, 1888, p. 759.

Sequestration—Trustee—Tantum et Tale—Assignation.

6. By antenuptial marriage-contract a lady who, with her husband, was domiciled in Germany, conveyed her whole estate, including acquirenda, to trustees, of whom her brother was one, for behoof of herself and her children. She subsequently succeeded to a legacy, which was arrested ad fundandam jurisdictionem in the hands of the representative of the donor (to whom the marriage-contract trust had not been intimated), by the trustee on her brother's sequestrated estate, for a debt alleged to be due by her to the latter. Held (diss. Lord Shand) that the arrestments were bad, as the trustee had no higher right than the bankrupt, who could not have benefited by his failure to intimate the marriage-contract trust to the testamentary trustee to the prejudice of the beneficiaries under the trust, whose interests it was his duty to protect. Graeme's Trustee v. Giersberg, June 1, 1888, p. 691.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Sequestration—Statutory examination—Examination of debtor to the estate —Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 90 and 91.

7. In the sequestration of a bankrupt, the trustee examined a trader with reference to accounts of sales made by him for the bankrupt on which he had charged commission, and asked how he had disposed of the goods. The trader deponed that he had himself bought the goods. The trustee having further asked, "What did you do with those goods when you took possession of them?" the witness objected to the competency of the question. Held that the trustee was entitled to put the question. Brash v. Arnott's Trustee, March 13, 1888, p. 583.

Trust for creditors—Principal and Agent—Lease—Security.

8. A landed proprietor conveyed his whole estates to a trustee for behoof of his creditors, having the day before executed a lease of a farm in his own occupation in favour of the trustee, in security of advances to be made by him under the trust. The lease bore that the stock on the farm, of which the heritable estate mainly consisted, had been sold to the trustee for a price named, which price (it was by separate letter agreed) was not to be paid, but was to be imputed towards payment of the advances. It was also agreed that the truster should manage the farm for the trustee. The ostensible possession and ownership of the farm and stock continued in the truster, who incurred considerable debts in the course of his management. In an action against the trustee for payment of certain of these debts at the instance of tradesmen who had supplied the goods in ignorance of the trust arrangement, held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the effect of the deeds was to divest the granter of his estates, that his possession of the farm thereafter was as agent of the trustee, and consequently that the trustee was liable (to the extent of the trust-estate) in payment of goods supplied to the order of his agent in execution of his agency. Decree therefore granted. Macphail & Son v. Maclean's Trustee, Nov. 16, 1887, p. 47.

Balancing accounts in bankruptcy—Lease.

9. A tenant under an agricultural lease for nineteen years, having during its currency granted a disposition omnium bonorum, the trustee declined to adopt the lease, but entered into an agreement with the landlord whereby, on the narrative that it was expedient to arrange for laying down the crops for the current year, he continued the occupation of the farm till the following Whitsunday. By a second agreement the landlord agreed to take over and pay for certain articles which were on the farm at a valuation. These articles having been valued, the landlord sought to compensate the claim against him for their value by a debt due to him by the tenant, for which he could only rank as an ordinary creditor. Held that the debt due by the landlord had been incurred subsequently to the tenant's bankruptcy, and could not be compensated by the debt incurred by the tenant prior to bankruptcy. Taylor's Trustees v. Paul, Jan. 24, 1888, p. 313.

10. Question, whether private trusts can be brought under the superintendence of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, in terms of the 166th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. Raeburn's Trustees, June 12, 1888, p. 740.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. Diligence—Suspension of Charge—Caution.

1. In a suspension brought by the acceptor of a bill of a charge given by the drawer, the complainer averred that the bill had been delivered by him as a blank bill to the drawer to be used for a different purpose from that for which it was used, but it appeared from letters signed by the complainer that he had admitted liability for the bill. Held that the complainer was not entitled to have the charge suspended without finding caution. Simpson v. Brown, June 9, 1888, p. 716.

2. In an action upon a bill, on which the acceptor's name had been cancelled, the pursuer proved that the bank-agent to whom the bill had been sent for collection had taken payment from the acceptor, and had allowed him to cancel his signature; that the latter had paid the bill in the belief that the holder had agreed to a condition which he, the acceptor, had intimated to the bank-agents, viz., that payment of the bill should extinguish all claim by the holder for interest and expenses; that the holder had not agreed to that condition, or authorised the bank-agent to take payment on that condition, and that the holder had accordingly returned the money to the acceptor, and recovered the bill. Held that the bank-agent had no authority to agree to the payment and cancellation on the condition stated, and that if he believed that he had such authority the cancellation had been made under a mistake, and that in either view the cancellation was inoperative. Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Co., Feb. 10, 1888, p. 408.

Held (per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill) that the Dean of Guild in considering a petition for a lining has no jurisdiction to entertain the question whether, on a construction of the titles of other feuars, a restriction ought to be imported into the title of the petitioner, when that title is in itself unambiguous and unrestricted. CHURCH. Patron—Compensation—Church Patronage Act, 1874, secs. 4 and 5.

1. A patron obtained in 1875 in terms of the Church Patronage Act, 1874, an interlocutor by the Sheriff determining the amount of compensation to which he was entitled under the Act for the loss of the patronage of a parish, and finding and declaring that on the occurrence of a vacancy he should be entitled to receive from the heritors payment of the amount by four equal yearly instalments out of the first four years' stipend. A vacancy occurred in the parish in 1880, and a new minister was appointed, but the patron did not intimate the Sheriff's interlocutor to the heritors or apply for payment of his compensation till 1887—the whole stipend having been in the meantime paid in each year to the minister. Held that as the heritors were in bona fide in paying away the whole stipends for the four years over which the deduction in respect ~~of the compensa~~tion would have spread, the patron had lost his claim against them by neglecting to apply for his compensation within that period. Earl of Strathmore v. Heritors of Rescobie, Feb. 1, 1888, p. 364.

2. An heir of entail in possession claimed compensation for the value of the patronage of a parish church. He died after receiving one of the four equal statutory instalments. Held, on a construction of the Patronage Act, 1874, sec. 4, that the heir succeeding to the entailed estates had no right to any part of the patronage compensation, and that the same was personal to the deceased heir in possession who claimed it, and therefore fell to his executor. Paterson v. Paterson, July 20, 1888, p. 1060.

Allocation of seats—Property—Parts and Pertinents.

4. Where seats in a parish church are allocated to heritors according to real rent, they are parts and pertinents of the property in respect of which they are allocated, and cannot be alienated therefrom. Stephen v. Anderson, Nov. 18, 1887, p. 72.

Episcopal Church—Cy près.

5. Circumstances in which it was held that a church which had belonged to the "Licensed Episcopal" congregation of a town (which had for many years ceased to exist), fell to be made over to the "Scottish Episcopal" congregation of the town. Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin, June 12, 1888, p. 723.

COMPANY. Promotion money—Payments to a firm, one of whom was a director —Right to retain against firm.

1. A mine-owner in San Francisco entered into an agreement with a firm of merchants there to pay them the half of any profit upon the sale of the mine in Great Britain. B, a partner of the firm, subsequently introduced the seller to purchasers in Great Britain, and although he took no part in deciding as to the purchase his name appeared in the prospectus of a company which was formed for the purpose of buying and working the mine as a provisional director, and also in the memorandum and articles of association as an original director. He subsequently acted as a director. The agreement between his firm and the seller was never communicated to the shareholders. The firm's share in the purchase price to the extent of £7000 was applied by the company as payments on account of shares which the firm agreed to take. Held that as B had, with the knowledge of his firm, occupied a fiduciary position towards the company in the purchase of the mine, his firm were bound to repay the £7000 to the company. Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. v. Falkner, Bell, & Co., Jan. 13, 1888, p. 290.

Register of members—Effect of registration.

2. Held that a person who applied for shares in a company registered under the Companies Acts, and authorised his name to be placed on the register of members, became, on allotment of the shares and registration of his name in terms of his authority, a shareholder of the company, and was not entitled to have his name removed from the register by shewing that he did not become a shareholder on his own account, but merely that he might, by agreement with the directors, place the shares among such persons as he found willing to take them. Miln v. North British Fresh Fish Supply Co., Limited, Nov. 15, 1887, p. 21.

Action for registration of transfer—Process—All parties not called.

3. The transferee of stock in a railway company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to register the transfer. The company in defence averred that the transferor had instructed them not to register the transfer, on the ground that the transferee was "illegally disposing of" the transferor's stock; and pleaded "all parties are not called." The Court held that it was not necessary to call the transferor as a defender in the action, but in respect that the action had not been formally intimated to him ordained the defenders to transmit to him a copy of the record and a copy of the interlocutor certifying him that if he failed within eight days to state objections to the registration of the transfer, judgment would be pronounced against the defenders. Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 7, 1888, p. 504.

Reparation—Fraud—Title to sue—Shareholder—Restitutio in integrum.

4. In 1877 a joint stock company was formed to buy an estate in Norway, believed to be valuable for its timber and minerals, at the price of £3800, three-fourths of the price to be paid in cash, the remainder in shares. The company entered into possession of the estate in 1877, and carried on business till 1884, when it was resolved to wind up the company. In November 1883 one of the partners raised an action of damages against the vendor for the loss the pursuer had sustained by becoming an original shareholder of the company, on the ground that he had been induced to do so by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the vendor. After a proof, held that fraudulent misrepresentation had not been proved, and that the vendor was not liable, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill further holding that having regard to the proceedings of the company the pursuer had no title to sue, Lord Rutherfurd Clark reserving his opinion. Dunnett v. Mitchell, Dec. 7, 1887, p. 131.

Preference shares—Dividend—Payment of arrears out of subsequent profits.

5. Preference shares in a limited company were isued under special resolution of the company, "these shares to be entitled to a preferential dividend of 5½ per cent per annum." During two years there were no profits of the company wherewith to pay the guaranteed dividend. Held (1) that the preference shareholders were entitled to payment of the arrears of dividend out of the first profits made by the company, but (2) that interest was not due on the arrears. Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill Gas Co., Limited, v. Taylor, June 5, 1888, p. 711.

CONTRACT. Construction— Whether according to schedule rates or for a lump sum.

1. Terms of offer for a building contract which, with acceptance, were held to constitute a contract according to the schedule rates, and not a contract for a lump sum, so that the offerer was not barred by an error in calculating the lump sum from claiming the full sum brought out at his rates. Jamieson v. M'Innes, Oct. 29, 1887, p. 17.

Construction—Expositio contemporanea.

2. Where the parties to a long lease had for a long period of years acted on a particular construction of obligation of relief of public burdens held that such construction must be regarded as the true meaning of the obligation, and receive effect accordingly. Jopp's Trustees v. Edmond, et e contra, Jan. 11, 1888, p. 271.

Conditions.

3. Notice (printed on letter of acceptance by the sellers) headed "Terms of Sale," and intimating that the sellers gave no warranty as to subjects sold, held effectual to bind the buyers. Smith & Son v. Waite, Nash, & Co., March 9, 1888, p. 533.

4. Condition alleged to be implied in a lease on the ground that it was in accordance with the good faith of the contract. Craig v. Millar, July 20, 1888, p. 1005.

Breach—Different actions of damages founded on one breach—Competency.

5. of the Patents, Designs, and Trades-Marks Act, 1883, the application being for "a range door, with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to be registered." The drawing shewed a moulding on the top of the door fitting into the moulding on the front of the range, and flush with it. The merit of the design lay in attaching the moulding to the door instead of to the fire-cover, the arrangement formerly in use in convertible kitchen ranges. Held that another design, which differed from the above in this, that the moulding on the door overlapped the moulding on the front of the range, was, except in certain immaterial respects, an "obvious imitation" of or identical with the registered design, and an infringement of it. Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. Hecla Foundry Co., May 25, 1888, p. 660.

CUSTOM. Admissibility to construe written contract.

1. Held that averments of custom of trade cannot be admitted to probation in order to construe a written contract clearly expressed.

A steel company contracted to supply "the whole of the steel required by" a firm of contractors in the building of a bridge, "the estimated quantity of steel to be 30,000 tons, more or less." In an action at the instance of the steel company against the contractors to have it declared that they were entitled to supply, and the defenders were bound to take from them all the steel necessary for the bridge, the contractors averred that according to the custom of the steel trade the contract was a contract only for the estimated quantity, with a margin of variation not exceeding 5 per cent. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the words of contract being plain and unambiguous the averment was not relevant to be admitted to probation. Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co., Dec. 22, 1887, p. 215.

Ship—Demurrage—Discharge of mixed cargo in separate lots—Custom of the port.

2. A ship, chartered to carry to the United Kingdom a cargo of ash and bones, the discharge of cargo to be according to the custom of the port of discharge, received from the charterers and loaded 33 tons of ash, about 397 tons of bones, and about 20 tons of horns, hoofs, and piths (which last were partly intermixed with the bones and partly loaded on the top of them). The master granted bills of lading for 33 tons of ash and 417 tons of bones. On arrival at the port of call the ship was directed to proceed to Aberdeen. The master having on the demand of the consignees there, but under protest, separated the hoofs, horns, and piths from the bones before giving delivery, brought an action against the consignees for four days' demurrage on account of the delay caused by this separation. After a proof, from which it appeared that the trade in bones at Aberdeen was of only about thirty years' standing, and almost entirely in the hands of the defenders themselves, held, inter alia, that the defenders had failed to prove any custom of the port entitling them to require the ship to effect such separation. Clacevich v. Hutchison & Co., Oct. 28, 1887, p. 11.

DELEGATION. Police Commissioners—Power of committees to delegate to subcommittee—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 63—Dundee Police and Improvement Act, 1882.

Under the powers conferred by sec. 63 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, incorporated with the Dundee Police Act, 1882, the Dundee Police Commissioners appointed a works committee to superintend the building of houses, &c. This committee had no express power under the general or local Act to delegate its powers. The committee remitted certain plans to a "subcommittee" of their number. The subcommittee issued a deliverance in name of "the Commissioners" disapproving the plans. On ELECTION LAW. Service Franchise—Soldier—Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 3.

1. A soldier who has, in respect of his position in the army, lived in separate apartments in barracks for the qualifying period, is entitled as a servant of the Queen to be enrolled in the register of voters as tenant of a "dwelling-house."

Held further, that commissioned officers who each had the exclusive occupation of a bedroom for the qualifying period, but took their meals in a mess-room, to which they had a common right, were also entitled to be placed upon the roll of voters. Gay v. M'Gill, Nov. 23, 1887, p. 90.

Service Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Miner out on strike—Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 3.

2. A miner who occupied a dwelling-house by virtue of his contract of employment having gone out on strike, his employer, on 24th August 1887, obtained decree of ejection. The decree had not been extracted, and he still occupied the house on 6th October 1887, when the Sheriff proceeded to consider his claim to be put upon the roll of voters. Held that having left the employment and suffered decree of ejection to go out against him, he was not in occupation by virtue of any right, and was therefore not entitled to be put upon the roll. Strachan v. Binnie, Jan. 19, 1888, p. 308.

ENTAIL. Power to feu—Consent subject to conditions—Entail Amendment Act, 1848, sec. 4.

1. An heir of entail in possession presented a petition under section 4 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, in which he prayed the Court to grant warrant to him to feu the entailed estate (with certain exceptions), "at such times, in such portions, and for payment of such feu-duties as the petitioner may think fit," subject to the condition contained in a deed of consent by the next heir (whose consent was alone requisite to enable the petitioner to disentail), that no feu-charter or long lease should be granted during the lifetime of the consenter without his consent to the terms thereof. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) granted the prayer of the petition. Christie, June 27, 1888, p. 793.

Provisions to younger children—Power of entailer over amount of—Aberdeen Act.

2. An heir of entail executed a bond of provision on the narrative of the Aberdeen Act, whereby he provided £10,000, calculated to be the amount of three years' rents of his entailed estate, to his second son, or in the event of that being held beyond his powers, £9000 to his second son, £600 to his third son, and £400 to his fourth son; or in the event of its being held beyond his powers to give the whole or an unequal portion to his second son, then he provided £10,000 to his whole younger children, five in number, equally. Held, by a majority of the whole Court (Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Mure, Shand, Rutherfurd Clark, Adam, Kinnear, and M'Laren), that it was within the powers of the granter to provide the whole amount of the three years' rents to the second son.

Lord Fraser and Lord Trayner held that the second alternative provision of £9000 to the second son, £600 to the third, and £400 to the fourth should receive effect.

Lord Young and Lord Lee held that under the statute the provision to one child could not exceed one year's free rent, and therefore that the third mode of provision, viz., in favour of the younger children equally, was the only one that could receive effect. Paterson v. Paterson, July 20, 1888, p. 1060.

ENTAIL—Continued.

Provisions to younger children—Money held under trust to purchase and entail lands—Aberdeen Act.

3. An heir of entail in possession executed a bond of provision in virtue of the powers contained in the Aberdeen Act, providing to his younger children a sum equal to three years' rent of his entailed estates. In addition to the lands under the entail he held also certain sums of money invested under a trust for the purchase of additional lands to be entailed in the same way, or to be applied in payment of children's provisions charged on the entailed estate, in regard to which sums he had "the same powers" as if the money had been already applied in the purchase of such lands. Held that the interest of these sums fell to be included with the rent of the entailed estate in calculating the amount due to the younger children under the bond of provision. Paterson v. Paterson, July 20, 1888, p. 1060.

Patronage compensation—Church Patronage Act, 1874.

4. An heir of entail in possession claimed compensation for the value of the patronage of a parish church. He died after receiving one of the four equal statutory instalments. Held, on a construction of the Patronage Act, 1874, sec. 4, that the heir succeeding to the entailed estates had no right to any part of the patronage compensation, and that the same was personal to the deceased heir in possession who claimed it, and therefore fell to his executor. Paterson v. Paterson, July 20, 1888, p. 1060.

Improvement expenditure—Extent of right of legatee of heir of entail to charge entailed estate—Entail Amendment Act, 1875, secs. 8 and 11—Entail Act, 1882, sec. 6.

5. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that under the above Acts the bond and disposition in security to which the legatee of an heir of entail, who has died without charging the estate for improvement expenditure, is entitled is limited to three-fourths of the sum expended on the improvements. Leith v. Leith, July 18, 1888, p. 944.

Improvement expenditure—Expenses of application—Entail Amendment Act, 1875, sec. 7.

6. Held that where an entailed estate is charged under secs. 8 and 11 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, by bond and disposition in security with three-fourths of improvement expenditure, the charger is only entitled to have included in the bond three-fourths of the actual or estimated costs of the application. Leith v. Leith, July 18, 1888, p. 944.

Consigned money—Railway—Loan by trustees to heir in possession on security of fee-simple estate.

7. An heir of entail in possession prayed the Court to authorise trustees, who held a sum of money, consigned by a railway company as the price of part of the entailed lands taken for the purposes of their undertaking, in trust for himself and the succeeding heirs of entail, to lend the money to him on the security of an estate belonging to him in fee-simple. The Lord Ordinary reported the case. The Court remitted the petition to the Lord Ordinary to sanction the proposed loan, on his being satisfied with the sufficiency of the proposed security. Earl of Rosebery, July 4, 1888, p. 824.

Burden on entailed property—Disentail—Acquiescence of subsequent heirs.

8. The heir of entail in possession of K, an estate situated on the north bank of a river, in 1858 granted permission (not in writing) to M, the proprietor of lands on the other bank and tenant of the shootings on the entailed estate, to build over the river a carriage bridge, one of the abutments of which rested on part of the entailed lands. The bridge was connected by a good road, forty-five yards long, with a public road which ran along the north bank. The succeeding heir of entail, who in 1884 disentailed the estate, did not object to the continued use of the bridge by M. In 1885, after the death of the disentailer, M assigned the remainder of his lease of the shootings over K to W, who shortly thereafter placed a deer fence across the access to the bridge on the north side. In an action against M at the instance of W and the fee-simple proprietor of K, who up to that time had not objected to M's use of the bridge, for declarator that they were not entitled to have the use of the bridge discontinued, held that M's right to the use of the bridge rested on sufferance only, and that, therefore, the pursuers were entitled to declarator that he was not entitled to continue to use it. Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth, March 10, 1888, p. 540.

Disentail—"Heir-apparent"—Entail Amendment Act, 1848, secs. 2 and 52.

9. An heir of entail in possession presented a petition for authority, under the Rutherfurd Act, 1848, and subsequent Acts, to disentail the entailed estate on obtaining the consent of his eldest son as his "heir-apparent." The deed of entail provided that the heir in possession should for himself and his "heir-apparent" forfeit all right to the estate in the event of his succeeding to a certain peerage, to which at the date of the petition the former was heir-presumptive. Held that the petitioner's eldest son was his heir-apparent in the sense of the statute, notwithstanding the contingency to which the son's right of succession was exposed. Forbes v. Burness, June 29, 1888, p. 797.

EXECUTOR. Heir and Executor—Incidence of burdens.

1. Heritable property, burdened to the extent of £5000, was sold for £5100, the seller coming under an obligation to clear off incumbrances upon payment of the price. A few days after the purchase the purchaser died intestate. At the time of his death he had almost completed negotiations for a re-sale of the property, of which he had still to pay the price, and which was still burdened for £5000. In a special case between his heir and his executor, held (1) that it being incompetent to look at the circumstances as evidence of an intention on the part of the deceased to treat the subject purchased as moveable, it fell as heritable succession to the heir; and (2) that the price of £5100 fell to be paid by the executor without relief from the heir. Ramsay v. Ramsay, Nov. 15, 1887, p. 25.

Heir and Executor—Warrandice—By whom obligation of warrandice prestable—Catholic security.

2. An obligation to free lands of debt arising under the warrandice clause of a disposition falls to be satisfied by the executor of the granter of the disposition in a question between him and the heir.

In a trust-disposition and settlement, executed in 1853, the granter conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, failing heirs of his body, of conveying his estate of M, and his other lands in the county of L, to his brother, and the heirs of his body, under the fetters of an entail. By the same deed he directed his trustees, failing his own issue, to make over the whole residue of his estate to the person who should succeed to M. By a codicil, dated in 1876, he disponed to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, the lands of B and A (which were among the lands originally directed to be entailed), and bequeathed to her the whole residue of his estate. The disposition of B and A contained a clause of warrandice in ordinary form under the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), which imports absolute warrandice. In 1882 the truster granted a bond and disposition in security for £250,000 over the estates of M, B, and A. On the truster's death his widow maintained that the obligation of warrandice in the disposition of B and A shewed the truster's intention that she should be relieved of the heritable debt, which she would not be if she had to pay it out of the residue. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the obligation of warrandice was a personal obligation which fell to be satisfied out of the moveable estate before the residue could be ascertained, and that she was not entitled to be relieved by the truster's heir. Duchess of Montrose v. Stuart, Nov. 15, 1887, H. L., p. 19.

EXPENSES. Certificate of presiding Judge—Jury trial—Slander—Nominal damages—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 40.

1. The 40th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, enacts that where the pursuer in an action of damages in the Court of Session for defamation or libel recovers by the verdict of the jury less than £5, he shall not be entitled to recover from the defender any expenses unless the Judge before whom the verdict is obtained shall certify that the action was brought for vindication of character, and was, in his opinion, fit to be tried in the Court of Session. Held that when the Judge grants such certificate the Court will give effect to his opinion, and award expenses to the pursuer. Macmillan v. Wilsons, Oct. 25, 1887, p. 6.

Certificate of Lord Ordinary—Shipping Law—Salvage—Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854, sec. 460, and 1862, sec. 49.

2. In a salvage case, in which the Lord Ordinary gave decree for £50 and certified under the above Acts that the case was one fit to be tried in a superior Court, the Court held that the certificate had been properly given.
Observed that the Inner-House will be slow to interfere with the exercise by the Lord Ordinary of his discretion in regard to the granting of such a certificate, and that the circumstances of the case were such as justified the Lord Ordinary in granting it. Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co., June 14, 1888, p. 753.

Trust—Adjudication.

3. Held competent to adjudge a trust-estate for expenses decerned for against the trustees in a litigation in which the trust-estate was alone concerned. Stewart v. Forbes, Feb. 8, 1888, p. 383.

Taxation as between agent and client—Taking of land compulsorily—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 119.

4. A proprietor of lands brought an action against the Crown and against a railway company, concluding for declarator that he had right to the foreshore ex adverso of his lands, and for interdict against the railway company entering upon it. The pursuer obtained decree in his favour in the Court of Session, and in appeals by both defenders to the House of Lords, with a finding against the appellants for costs in the appeals. The railway company having then served on the proprietor a notice under the Lands Clauses Act of their intention to take the foreshore, the latter presented a petition to the House of Lords against the railway company praying that the costs in the appeal should be taxed as between agent and client in terms of section 119 of the Lands Clauses Act. Held that the costs in the railway company's appeal should be taxed as between agent and client. Young v. North British Railway Co., March 8, 1888, H. L., p. 32.

Decree for expenses—Assignation—Title to sue.

5. A defender obtained a decree for expenses against the pursuer, and thereafter assigned his interest therein to a third party. The assignee raised an action for the amount of the expenses against persons who were not named in the decree, averring that they had been the true domini litis in the former action. Held (reversing judgment of Lord Lee, Ordinary) that he had no title to sue. Rose v. Stevenson, Jan. 27, 1888, p. 336.

FISHINGS. Salmon-fishings—Division of, where ex adverso of adjoining properties—Property—Marches.

1. In a question as to the boundary between salmon-fishings ex adverso of two seaboard properties, circumstances in which it was held that a stream which at low water divided the foreshores of the properties unequally did not constitute a natural boundary between the salmon-fishings so as to displace the ordinary legal rule of division applicable to such cases in the absence of prescriptive possession. Magistrates of Tain v. Murray, Nov. 23, 1887, p. 83.

Salmon-fishings—Competing Title—Possession—Net and coble.

2. In an action brought by the burgh of Inverness and others, for declarator that the pursuers had the exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the river Ness from both banks from the stone X to the sea, the pursuers founded on a crown charter dated in 1591 ratifying all former grants to the town, and conveying "aquam de Nyss omnesque partes ac utrumque latus . . . cum omnibus piscationibus et piscariis tam salmonum quam aliorum piscium." Defences were lodged by the proprietor of the estate of Holme on the south bank, part of which was situate above the stone X and part below that mark. The defender held one half of the lands of Holme under Fraser of Balnain as superior upon a title which did not carry any right of fishing, and the other half of the lands as a feu from the Earl of Moray, on a title in which the subjects were described as " toto et integro dimidio villæ et terrarum de Holme . . . cum dimidio salmonum piscarium super aqua de Ness ad dict. terras apertans," the superior's title being a charter granted by Queen Mary in 1566 in favour of the Earl of Moray, conveying " dimidietatem terrarum de Holme cum salmonu et aliis piscariis earundem in aqua de Nysa." The disputed portion of the fishings (below the stone X) was ex adverso of part of the lands held of the Earl of Moray; the upper portion of the Holme fishings, which was not in dispute was partly ex adverso of the remainder of Lord Moray's feu and partly of Fraser of Balnain's feu. The defender did not dispute the pursuers' right to fish for salmon ex adverso of Holme below the stone X, but claimed a right along with them. The defender admitted that he had possessed the salmon-fishing ex adverso of the upper half of Holme. Held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the defender was entitled to absolvitor, in respect (1) that the grant to the Earl of Moray of one-half of the salmon-fishings of Holme was to be construed as a grant of one-half pro indiviso of the fishings pertaining to the whole lands of Holme; (2) that in the absence of evidence to the contrary, these were to be regarded as the fishings ex adverso of the whole lands; and (3) that on the evidence the defender's possession was sufficient to preserve his right.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that a general grant of fishings may be explained to include salmon-fishings by possession thereof in other ways than by net and coble fishing. Opinion contra per Lord Rutherfurd Clark. Warrand's Trustees v. Mackintosh, July 6, 1888, p. 833.

Salmon-fishing—Fishery Board—Title to sue—Interdict—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868.

3. Under the Salmon Fisheries Acts of 1862 and 1868 Fishery Boards have power to sue for penalties for offences under the Acts, and to apply summarily to the Sheriff for the enforcement of rules and regulations made by them. In a note of suspension and interdict brought by a Fishery Board at common law to prevent persons fishing in a manner alleged to be illegal, held that the complainers, being merely a statutory board with statutory remedies had no title to sue. Tay District Fishery Board v. Robertson, Nov. 16, 1887, p. 40.

Herring and White Fishing—Waste or uncultivated land beyond high-water mark—Act 11 Geo. III. cap. 31, sec. 11.

4. Prior to 1868 a piece of ground about four acres in extent, lying between a high road and the sea, and within 100 yards above the highest high-water mark, was in a waste and uncultivated condition. In that year the proprietor, at some expense, had it levelled, top-dressed with earth, and sown out with grass seeds, the result being that in place of a piece of beach with very rough accommodation for nets, a piece of fairly good pasture and of good net ground was provided. Both prior to and after 1868 fishermen made use of it for drying their nets, &c., paying a small rent to the tenant of the farm to which the ground belonged. In 1886 they claimed right to make use of it, under the above statute, without payment of rent. In an action by the proprietor and his tenant to have the fishermen interdicted from so using the ground, held that the ground was not waste or uncultivated in the sense of the statute. Interdict granted accordingly. Scott v. Gray, Nov. 15, 1887, p. 27.

FOREIGN. Domicile—Capacity to contract—Minor.

1. When a contract is executed in a country by a person domiciled there who by the law of the country has not the capacity to contract, the contract will not be valid in any country. Cooper v. Cooper, Feb. 24, 1888, H. L., p. 21.

Domicile—Anglo-Indian domicile.

2. A person's domicile of origin must prevail until he has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning it and of acquiring another as his sole domicile.

Observations (per Lord President) on Anglo-Indian domicile. Steel v. Steel, July 13, 1888, p. 896.

Divorce for desertion.

3. A Scotswoman married an Englishman and resided with him in England for about ten years. The husband having deserted his wife and gone to America, she returned to reside in Scotland. In an action brought by her there for divorce on the ground of desertion, held by Lord M'Laren (Ordinary) that the Court had no jurisdiction over the defender, and that the action was incompetent. Redding v. Redding, July 20, 1888, p. 1102.

Arrestments—Recall—Enforcement of order of English Court.

4. A having used arrestments to found jurisdiction, raised an action against a company in Queensland, and on the dependence arrested sums due to the company in the hands of its shareholders in Scotland. The company went into liquidation in Queensland, and subsequently in England, where the English liquidator obtained an order restraining A from prosecuting the action in Scotland, but bearing "this order is to be without prejudice to the security, if any, upon the amounts payable by the Scotch shareholders which" A "has acquired by the proceedings taken in Scotland." The order further directed that the amounts received from Scottish shareholders in respect of a call should be placed to a separate account. The Court of Session, on the application of the liquidator, granted an order enforcing the English order restraining A from proceeding with the action subject to the orders of the Court, but intimated that they held that such an order by them was unnecessary, and granted a petition for recall of the arrestments, holding that the terms of the order by the Court of Chancery prevented the respondent from being prejudiced. Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co., Limited, v. Australasian Investment Co., Limited, July 17, 1888, p. 935.

Company—Liquidator.

5. Observed that there is nothing incompatible in the co-existence of a Colonial and of an English liquidation of the same company. Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co., Limited, v. Australasian Investment Co., Limited, July 17, 1888, p. 935.

Ship—Bill of lading—Proof.

7. In an action brought by the owners of a Danish ship against the indorsees of the bill of lading for freight on the cargo delivered to them at the port of discharge in Scotland, the defenders averred that they had not received the full cargo specified in the bill of lading granted by the master at Riga, the port of shipment, and pleaded that they were entitled to retain from freight the value of the deficiency, alleging that by Danish law (the law of the flag) the bill of lading was conclusive against the owners. After a proof, which shewed that the indorsees of the bill of lading had only agreed to pay for so much of the cargo as was delivered to them, held that the defenders had only become indorsees of the bill of lading to the extent of the cargo actually on board the vessel, and were not entitled to retain any part of the freight.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill) that the owners were only liable for the cargo actually put on board, and that by the law of Scotland, which, as the law of the forum, must regulate the proof, the bill of lading was not conclusive evidence as to the amount of cargo shipped. Owners of the "Immanuel" v. Denholm & Co., Dec. 7, 1887, p. 152.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY. Assignation of shares in security—Intimation to manager.
D, a member of an investment society (who was also its manager), assigned certain shares of the society standing in his name to a firm in security of an advance of money. No intimation was made to the directors, and no alteration was at the time made in the shareholders' ledger, which was the only register of members kept by the society. In an action brought by the assignees against the society, held that the knowledge of D was not equivalent to knowledge on the part of the society, and that therefore the society was not in bad faith in making a payment to D on account of his shares after the date of the assignation, and that the society was not liable to the assignees for the sum so paid.

Question, whether such shares can be the subject of a security for an advance of money. Grigor Allan v. Urquhart, Nov. 16, 1887, p. 56.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Aliment—Amount.

1. In an action of separation and aliment against a husband, he agreed by joint minute to pay to his wife £250 per annum as aliment for herself and the two children of the marriage, who resided with her. The agreement was given effect to in an interlocutor granting decree of separation. Three years later he presented a petition to have the aliment restricted. His income having been ascertained to amount to £430 per annum, and his wife having no means of her own, the Court restricted the aliment to £150 per annum, although the husband had failed to prove that his income was less than at the date of the agreement. Stewart v. Stewart, Dec. 3, 1887, p. 113.

Liability to support wife's mother—Married Women's Property Act, 1877.

2. Held that a man who was married subsequent to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877, and who was not lucratus by the marriage, was not liable to aliment his wife's mother, in respect that the wife's obligation to aliment her mother was a subsisting obligation at the date of the marriage, and was an antenuptial debt in the sense of the Act. M'Allan v. Alexander, July 7, 1888, p. 863.

Jus relictæ—Implied renunciation—Wife's signature to husband's settlement.

3. A husband by his trust-disposition and settlement gave his wife the liferent of his whole means and estate, and in the fourth purpose directed his trustees, "after the death of the survivor of me and my said wife, and with her consent and full approval (in token of which she has subscribed this deed)," to pay over a large number of legacies, many of them to relatives of his wife. By the fifth purpose he directed that after the death of his widow his household furniture should be divided among certain of her relatives. The residue was to be devoted to religious and charitable purposes. The wife signed the deed. She survived her husband only a few weeks. Her executor, in a multiplepoinding brought by the husband's trustees, claimed her terce and jus relictæ, maintaining that her consent had been given to the legacies only, and not to the whole settlement. Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) that although it could not be inferred from the wife's signature to the deed that she gave any consent thereto further than the deed bore, her consent to the fourth purpose implied an acceptance of the liferent provided to her in the deed in lieu of terce and jus relictæ. Edward v. Cheyne, March 12, 1888, H. L., p. 33.

Implied donation of wife's income to husband.

4. In an action brought by the wife's executor against the husband's trustees held (in aff. judgment of the First Division) that the facts shewed that the wife had made a gift to her husband of her whole separate income, and of any savings she had made therefrom. Edward v. Cheyne, March 12, 1888, H. L., p. 37.

Mother's second marriage—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

5. Held that the fact of a mother entering into a second marriage does not affect her right under the above statute to be guardian to her children by the first marriage. Campbell v. Maquay, June 27, 1888, p. 784.

Divorce—Domicile—Anglo-Indian domicile.

6. A person's domicile of origin must prevail until he has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning it and of acquiring another as his sole domicile.

A Scotsman, born and educated in Scotland, raised an action of divorce in the Court of Session against his wife on the ground of desertion. The wife pleaded that the pursuer had lost his Scottish domicile and had not reacquired it. Evidence on which the Court held that the pursuer had not lost his domicile of origin, and that, therefore, the Court had jurisdiction in the cause.

Observations (per Lord President) on Anglo-Indian domicile. Steel v. Steel, July 13, 1888, p. 896.

Divorce—Desertion—Foreign.

7. A Scotswoman married an Englishman and resided with him in England for about ten years. The husband having deserted his wife and gone to America, she returned to reside in Scotland. In an action brought by her there for divorce on the ground of desertion, held by Lord M'Laren (Ordinary) that the Court had no jurisdiction over the defender, and that the action was incompetent. Redding v. Redding, July 20, 1888, p. 1102.

Divorce—Desertion.

8. It is not an answer to a husband's action of divorce on account of his wife's desertion, that she has left him because he had superseded her in the management of a shop belonging to him. Gould v. Gould, Dec. 22, 1887, p. 229.

Divorce—Alleged condonation pending reclaiming note against decree of divorce—Process.

9. A husband brought an action for divorce against his wife, founding on several alleged acts of adultery. The Lord Ordinary granted divorce, holding one of the alleged acts of adultery, but one only, to be proved. The defender reclaimed, and at the hearing moved to be allowed to aver, and to prove, that the pursuer had, after the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, condoned the adultery (assuming it to have been committed) by resuming cohabitation with her. The Court were of opinion that so long as the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor granting divorce stood, the plea of condonation was excluded, but having on a consideration of the evidence come to the conclusion that the act of adultery which the Lord Ordinary held to be proved was not proved, they recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and, without expressing any opinion regarding the other acts of alleged adultery, allowed the defender to plead, and to lead evidence of, condonation. Robertson v. Robertson, July 19, 1888, p. 1001.

Divorce—Condonation—Proof.

10. In an action of divorce on the ground of adultery, while it is competent to lead evidence of misconduct on the part of the defender prior to condonation in order to shew the character of the defender's subsequent actings, which are admitted or proved as facts, but are in themselves capable of being regarded in different lights, it is not competent to refer to such previous

Northern Marine Insurance Co., Limited, July 30, 1888, H. L., p. 72.
Fire insurance—Insurable interest—Right of postponed bondholder to recover insurance when prior bondholder has recovered sum sufficient to reinstate.
2. The proprietor of mills (which with the site were at least of the value of £10,000) granted bonds over them for £9000, and subsequently a postponed bond to another creditor for £900. Policies of fire insurance for £7000 were taken in name of the prior bondholders for behoof of themselves and of the owner in reversion. The postponed bondholder, an investment society, took a policy of fire insurance from another company for £900 in name of the society and of the owner " in reversion." The policy insured against damage by fire " the property described on the margin hereof." On the margin were set forth various items forming parts of the mills and machinery, with the specific sum insured on each. The owner paid the premiums of insurance. A fire occurred, which damaged the mills and stopped the works. The holders of the prior bonds obtained under their policies of insurance the sum of £5668, which was sufficient to reinstate the works, but they applied it in reduction of their debt. Subsequently the investment society raised an action, with consent and concurrence of the owner, against their insurers for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to be indemnified by the defenders against the loss they had sustained by the fire, and for payment. The defenders denied liability, on the ground that the loss caused by the fire had already been made good to the prior bondholders and the owner. It was admitted that at the date of the fire the subjects were of sufficient value to cover all the bonds, and that after the fire the subjects were not of sufficient value to meet the prior bonds. Held (aff. judgment of whole Court) that the defenders were bound under their contract to indemnify the investment society for the loss it had sustained by the fire. Westminster Fire Office v. Glasgow Provident Investment Society, Aug. 10, 1888, H. L., p. 89.

Making up Title—Royal Bank Stock.
2. Held that an interim act and decree appointing a judicial factor on a trust-estate in place of a deceased judicial factor, and authorising him to complete a title in his person to, inter alia, certain stock of the Royal Bank of Scotland standing in the name of the former judicial factor in the books of the bank, was a sufficient title to the bank to register him as proprietor of the stock in their books. 5. A landed proprietor having become insane, his brother, without judicial or other authority, managed his estate with the assistance of the law-agents who had previously managed the estate for the proprietor. After two years a curator bonis was appointed to the proprietor. In an action of accounting brought by the curator against the law-agents, the pursuer maintained that the defenders must be regarded as pro-curators, and were not entitled to credit for professional charges. Held that the law-agents were entitled to the ordinary remuneration for their services. 2. Circumstances in which an undischarged bankrupt, who had obtained credit to a considerable extent without disclosing that he was an undischarged bankrupt, was proved to have so acted with intent to defraud, and convicted of an offence under the Bankruptcy, Frauds, and Disabilities Act, 1884, sec. 4. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Livingstone, Feb. 29, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 48.

Crimes—Mobbing and Rioting—Day Poaching.

3. In a trial for the crimes of mobbing and rioting the evidence for the Crown was that the accused were part of a crowd exceeding a hundred persons who in the day-time entered upon an extensive deer forest and openly marched across it, shooting the deer thereon as they went; that they were seen by the keepers of the forest, who were unable to interfere with them on account of their numbers, and that they continued so acting for two days. The Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury that such conduct, if proved, amounted to the crime of mobbing and rioting. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Macrae, Jan. 18, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 33.

Crimes—Prevarication—Summary punishment—Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 27.

4. The Public-Houses Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 27, gives Magistrates trying complaints under the Act power to adjudge witnesses, who should "prevaricate or wilfully conceal the truth," to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding sixty days, without formal complaint, and in a summary manner, and provides that "the sentence awarding such punishment shall set forth shortly the nature of the offence." Held that under this enactment the particulars of the offence must be specified in the sentence, and that a sentence which merely found the witness "guilty while under examination on oath of prevarication and wilfully concealing the truth," fell to be quashed. Soutar v. Stirling, May 26, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 62.

Crimes—Theft.

5. Held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that a summary complaint in which the charge against the accused was that having, time and place libelled, "found in money one pound, he did deny having found the same, and did appropriate and thus steal the same," was not a relevant complaint, in respect that the facts stated did not necessarily infer the crime of theft. Campbell v. M'Lennan, March 20, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 55.

Statutory offences—Salmon-fishing—Weekly close time, calculation of—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862, sec. 7—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, sec. 24, and Sched. D, bye-law.

6. The occupier of a fishery in the Forth district was charged with a contravention of the 24th section of the Act of 1868, and the above bye-law, in so far as during the weekly close time, on a particular Saturday, he had failed to have three fly-nets thrown out of fishing order at six P.M., in terms of the bye-law. The Sheriff found the accused not guilty. On appeal the Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, holding that the practice of throwing nets out of fishing order after six P.M. on Saturday nights, when the state of the tide rendered compliance with the bye-law at that hour impossible, which was admitted to have existed in the Forth district since 1862, made it inexpedient for the Court to interfere with a judgment of acquittal. Osborne v. Anderson, Nov. 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 12.

Statutory offences—"Frequenting" with intent to commit a crime—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 272.

7. Section 272 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, enacts that every suspected person, or reputed thief, who is found "frequenting any street with intent to commit a crime" shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond, and liable to be imprisoned for sixty days. Held (diss. Lord Craighill, and the Lord Justice-Clerk giving no opinion) that proof that a known thief had been on the street libelled with intent to steal on a single occasion was not sufficient to satisfy the charge of frequenting the street with such intent. Linton v. Clark, Nov. 10, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 25.

Statutory Offences—Poaching—Day Trespass Act, 1832—Ground Game Act, 1880, sec. 1.

8. Held that a person who had been found on a farm shooting ground game with the written permission of the occupier of the farm, but who was not one of the persons specified in sec. 1, subsec. 1 (b) of the Ground Game Act, 1880, had been rightly convicted of a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, 1832. Niven v. Renton, Feb. 10, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 42.

Statutory Offences—Weights and Measures Act, 1878, sec. 59—Proof—Onus.

9. The Weights and Measures Act, 1878, sec. 59, enacts that where any false weight is found in the possession of any person carrying on trade, such person shall be deemed, for the purposes of the Act, until the contrary is proved, to have such weight for use for trade. Evidence stated by magistrates in a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, which was held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) not to warrant the magistrates in convicting a trader of a contravention of the above Act, and conviction quashed accordingly.

Per Lord Young—The preliminary necessity is that the magistrate shall be satisfied that the weights were used, or intended to be used, and if the magistrate is satisfied that they were not, or is not satisfied that they were used, or intended to be used, he is not to convict merely because the accused has led no evidence, or has not proved, that they were not used, or intended to be used. Hood v. Malcolm, Nov. 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 4.

Statutory offences—Cruelty to animals—Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act.

10. In a complaint against a cattle-dealer for a contravention of the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850, by sawing off the horns of oxen close to the skull, it was proved that the operation caused great pain to the animals operated on, but that it was in common use throughout the counties of Fife, Forfar, and Kincardine, as a means of preventing the cattle doing each other harm by goring one another, or when in railway trucks; and that in other districts operations securing the same result, but painless, were made use of. The Sheriff-substitute acquitted the accused. In an appeal the Court affirmed the judgment, holding that the operation being a customary operation for a legitimate and useful purpose, did not infer a contravention of the Act. Renton v. Wilson, June 1, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 84.

Procedure—Instance—Complaint—Desertion of diet pro loco et tempore.

11. When a prosecutor deserts a complaint pro loco et tempore the complaint falls, and it is incompetent again to cite the accused to answer to it, though the prosecutor may raise a new complaint in the same terms. Collins v. Lang, Nov. 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 7.

Procedure—Private Prosecutor—Concurrence of Lord Advocate.

12. Circumstances in which the Court, while indicating that in very exceptional circumstances they might authorise a private person to prosecute without the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, refused to grant such authority. Robertson v. H. M. Advocate, Oct. 28, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Procedure—Indictment—Modus—Specification—Reset.

13. An indictment bore—"The charge against you is that, on several occasions, between 1st October 1886 and 15th January 1888, at your premises in Saracen Street, &c. aforesaid, you did reset 100 tons of pig-iron, the same having been dishonestly appropriated by theft." Held that it was irrelevant for want of specification. Her Majesty's Advocate v. M'Donald, Feb. 29, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 47.

Procedure—Indictment—Latitude in time—Incest.

14. Question, whether an indictment charging the panel with having committed incest on several occasions during a period of seven years was relevant. Her Majesty's Advocate v. A E, Dec. 5, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 32.

Procedure—Indictment—Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, secs. 5 and 8.

15. A B was convicted before a Sheriff and a jury upon an indictment which bore—"The charge against you is that, on 10th March 1888 you did, in the shop . . . pretend to A S that you had just come from the Royal Bank at Perth, and had been promoted to be teller in the branch of that bank at Leith, and did thus induce the said A S to deliver to you at Elm Row, Edinburgh, on 18th March 1888 a piano, which you appropriated to your own use, without paying or intending to pay therefor."

The Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) suspended the sentence, Lord M'Laren holding that falsehood and fraud were facts necessary to support the charge, and that as the indictment did not set forth these it was not relevant—Lord Young, while concurring with Lord M'Laren, resting his judgment on the ground that the case proved was one of theft, and that the indictment was not fitted for the safe trial of a charge of theft. Dingwall v. Her Majesty's Advocate, May 26, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 69.

Procedure—Proof—Competency—Evidence of accused in previous civil action.

16. Opinions that in a criminal trial statements made by the accused as a witness in a previous civil action, relating to the same subject-matter, may be used as evidence against him. Banaghan v. Her Majesty's Advocate, Feb. 10, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 39.

Procedure—Proof—Competency—Statement by prisoner volunteered to policeman.

17. Held that a statement voluntarily made by an accused person while out on bail to the policeman who had apprehended him regarding the crime with which he was charged was competent evidence against the accused, although the policeman had not cautioned the accused. Smith v. Lamb, March 16, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 54.

Procedure—Proof—Witnesses—Particeps criminis.

18. Where a father was charged with incest committed with his daughter, held (per Lord Young) that the daughter was not competent as a witness for the Crown, she being of full age and not having been herself charged with the crime. H. M. Advocate v. A E, Dec. 5, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 32.

19. Held that in a trial on a charge of procuring abortion, the evidence of the woman on whom the act was said to have been committed was competent, though she was not charged with the crime. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Rae, July 3, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 80.

Procedure—Proof—Prior attempts.

20. In a trial on a charge of procuring abortion held competent to lead proof to shew that some months before the act charged the accused had undertaken to procure abortion in the case of another woman. H. M. Advocate v. Rae, July 30, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 80.

Proof—Declaration—Right of accused to have assistance of law-agent—Criminal Law Procedure Act, 1887, sec. 17.

21. The declaration of an illiterate woman charged with the crime of murder was not admitted when tendered in evidence, in respect the accused had not been informed before emitting it of her right to have the assistance and advice of a law-agent. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Goodall, May 3, 1888, Just. Cases. p. 82.

Procedure—Sentence—Culpable Homicide.

22. Circumstances in which a person who had pleaded guilty to a charge of culpable homicide by shooting a fellow clerk with a revolver, was dismissed

Procedure—Withdrawal of plea—Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, secs. 31 and 41.

23. Where a person accused of a crime has, under the 31st section of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, intimated his intention of pleading guilty, and has been brought before the Sheriff and pleaded guilty, and has been remitted to the High Court for sentence, he cannot on being brought up for sentence withdraw his plea, sec. 41 of the Criminal Procedure Act not being applicable to such a case. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Lyon, May 26, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 66.

Review—Suspension.

24. A person accused before a Glasgow Police Court having appeared to answer to the complaint, the diet was on the prosecutor's motion deserted pro loco et tempore, and he was liberated, and a pledge he had left for his appearance was returned to him. The prosecutor into whose hands the complaint had come subsequently obtained a warrant to re-cite, and it was again served upon the accused. He did not appear, but was apprehended, tried, and convicted. In a suspension of the proceedings brought by him, it was maintained that a suspension was incompetent, his remedy being under the local Police Act, which prescribed a different mode of appeal, or being by appeal on a stated case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875. Held that the objection could not be sustained, because the proceedings against him under the new citation were fundamentally null, and therefore liable to suspension. Collins v. Lang, Nov. 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 7.

25. Question, whether it is a competent ground of suspension that a Sheriff's charge to the jury at a criminal trial was erroneous in law. Banaghan v. Her Majesty's Advocate, Feb. 10, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 39.

Review—Appeal—Bond of caution.

26. In a note to have a Sheriff ordained to state a case for appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, it appeared that the bond of caution required by the Act to be lodged by a party desiring to have a case for appeal stated reached the Sheriff-clerk on the morning after the statutory period of three days had expired (having been posted the evening before), but no special circumstances were stated. The Court declined to ordain the Sheriff to state a case.

Question, whether the Court has power in special circumstances to authorise a bond to be received after the lapse of the three days. M'Gregor v. Rose, Nov. 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 10.

Review—Appeal—Form of questions in law.

27. Questions of law in appeals on stated cases, in the form "whether in view of the facts found proved the magistrate ought to have convicted," are not absolutely incompetent, but ought to be avoided. Dickson v. Linton, June 1, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 76.

Objection to conviction in inferior Court—Form of complaint—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879.

28. In summary prosecutions, under the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, it is sufficient that the procedure complies with the provisions of that Act, although it does not satisfy the requirements of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881. Dickson v. Linton, June 1, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 76.

LEASE. Construction.

1. Where the parties to a long lease had for a long period of years acted on a particular construction of obligation of relief of public burdens, held that such construction must be regarded as the true meaning of the obligation, and must receive effect accordingly. Jopp's Trustees v. Edmond, Jan. 11, 1888, p. 271.

LEASE—Continued.

Subject of lease—Implied obligation—Breach of contract.

2. Certain premises in a densely populated part of Glasgow, known as "Graham's Lodging House," were let on lease for seven years. After four years of the lease had run, the landlord, who owned an adjacent block of buildings, converted it into and started a rival lodging-house. There was no express condition in the lease against his so doing. The tenant brought an action of damages against the landlord on the ground that the landlord's actings were in violation of the good faith of the contract. Held after a proof, by a majority of the whole Court (diss. Lord Lee), that the lease in favour of the pursuer implied no obligation on the part of the landlord not to set up a rival establishment.

Opinions that such a restriction could not be implied from the circumstances in which a lease was granted. Opinions contra per Lord Lee and Lord Fraser. Craig v. Millar, July 20, 1888, p. 1005.

Waygoing crop—Reference to man of skill—Power to take evidence.

3. In a reduction of a decreet-arbitral following upon a reference to two men of skill as arbiters under a lease as to the value of a waygoing crop, the pursuer averred that parties were not heard, that only one of the arbiters had seen the crop after it had been cut, and that no evidence had been led as to its value. Held that no relevant ground for reduction had been stated, and action dismissed. Logan v. Leadbetter, Dec. 6, 1887, p. 115.

Compensation—Notice to and consent of landlord—Reference—Jurisdiction—Interdict—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, secs. 3, 4, 20, and sched., parts i. and ii.

4. The tenant of a farm under a nineteen years' lease died, and his estates were sequestrated and a trustee appointed thereon. The trustee carried on the farm for some time, and when he gave it up gave notice of a claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, for improvements. The claim consisted of seven heads. The trustee appointed a referee to judge on the claim in terms of the Act. The landlord also appointed a referee, but limited his powers to judging on the sixth and seventh heads of the claims, on the ground that the first five heads did not fall under the statute, in respect that to some of the improvements his consent had not been obtained, and that notice had not been given to him in terms of the statute that the others were about to be executed. The trustee thereupon applied to the Sheriff to have a referee appointed in place of the one appointed by the landlord, and the appointment was made. The landlord thereupon presented a note of suspension and interdict to have the trustee's referee and the referee appointed by the Sheriff interdicted from proceeding with the reference, alleging that five heads of the claim were outwith the statute. The trustee stated that he was not aware whether the statutory requirements with regard to notice or consent had been observed. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) held that the suspension was competent, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to pass the note. Sinclair v. Clyne's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1887, p. 185.

Bankruptcy of tenant—Balancing accounts in bankruptcy.

5. A tenant under an agricultural lease for nineteen years, having during its currency granted a disposition omnium bonorum, the trustee declined to adopt the lease, but entered into an agreement with the landlord whereby, on the narrative that it was expedient to arrange for laying down the crops for the current year, he continued the occupation of the farm till the following Whitsunday. By a second agreement the landlord agreed to take over and pay for certain articles which were on the farm at a valuation. These articles having been valued, the landlord sought to compensate the claim against him for their value by a debt due to him by the tenant, for which he could only rank as an ordinary creditor. Held that the debt due by the landlord had been incurred subsequently to the tenant's bankruptcy, and could not be compensated by the debt incurred by the tenant prior to bankruptcy. Taylor's Trustees v. Paul, Jan. 24, 1888, p. 313.

LEASE—Continued.

Hypothec—Hypothec Abolition Act, 1880, sec. 1—Houses and land separately let by one writing—Invecta et illata—Cattle.

6. A proprietor granted a written lease of a dwelling-house, with byres and other offices "for one year from Whitsunday 1887 till Whitsunday 1888 at the rent of £30 sterling, payable at Martinmas, also three grass fields . . . . 25 acres, till Martinmas, at the rent of £70 sterling, payable at Martinmas." The house and offices were not on the fields let, but on separate though adjoining lands. Held (1) that the house and offices were let separately from the fields, and therefore that the Hypothec Abolition Act did not apply to them, and (2) that the landlord was entitled to sequestrate cattle in the offices. Clark v. Keirs, Feb. 25, 1888, p. 458.

Hypothec.

7. Question, whether goods in the possession of a tenant under a contract of "sale or return" are subject to the landlord's hypothec. Macdonald v. Westren, July 19, 1888, p. 988.

Crofter—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886.

8. A person who at the passing of the above Act was a crofter complying with the conditions of sec. 34 died before the parish in which his croft was situated had been declared a crofting parish in terms of sec. 19. In an action of removing by his landlord against his heir, who was in possession and occupation of the croft, held that the defender was a crofter in the sense of the Act, and entitled to resist removing, subject to the conditions of sec. 1. M'Nab v. Campbell, Feb. 29, 1888, p. 472.

9. Where a crofter had several years before the passing of the above Act entered into an arrangement with a farm-servant engaged yearly, from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, to allow him to occupy a house and part of the arable ground on the croft, as part remuneration for his services, and had continued this arrangement after Whitsunday 1887, held that, as the subdivision of the croft had taken place prior to the passing of the Act, the crofter had not by the mere continuance of the arrangement after that date subdivided his holding and so committed a breach of the statutory condition contained in sec. 1, subsec. 4, of the Act. Lord Abinger v. Cameron, March 16, 1888, p. 598.

Reparation—Game damage—Fences—Wire-netting—Landlord's right to remove.

10. The landlord of a farm was bound by the lease to repair the fences, and on that being done the tenant accepted the fences "as in sufficient tenantable condition and repair, and binds and obliges himself to uphold them in tenantable condition during the currency of the lease, and to leave them in the like condition at the expiry thereof, ... and the tenant shall also be at half the expense of upholding plantation and march-fences." At the beginning of the lease the lands let were separated from a plantation (which also was the landlord's property, and was full of ground game) by a fence lined with wire-netting. The landlord sometime after the beginning of the lease removed the netting. Held that the tenant was entitled to have the netting restored, and to recover damages for injury done to his crops by ground game coming out of the plantation after the removal of the netting. Cameron v. Drummond, March 2, 1888, p. 489.

Reparation—House becoming uninhabitable—Liability of landlord for death in tenant's family.

11. Action by the tenant of a house against the landlord for damages on account of the alleged insanitary condition of the house, and for solatium for the death of two children of the tenant through the same cause, held irrelevant from want of specification.

Observed (per Lord Young) that where tenants continue to inhabit a house which they believe to be dangerous to health through the fault of the landlord they cannot hold him responsible for any evil consequence arising from the continued occupation. Henderson v. Munn, July 7, 1888, p. 859.

Reparation—Urban tenement—Injury to business by operations of neighbouring occupier.

12. Where a tenant of an urban tenement sues his landlord for damages in respect that his rights as occupant have been encroached on by operations carried on by the proprietor of a neighbouring tenement, he must aver, in order to found a relevant action, that he has applied to his landlord to have his rights protected, and that the landlord in breach of his duty, has refused, or unduly delayed, to protect them. Menzies v. Whyte, Feb. 29, 1888, p. 470.

Reparation—Wrongous use of diligence.

13. A tenant of grazings agreed with his landlord in writing to have a certain amount of stock always on the ground while the rent remained unpaid. He also granted a bill for the rent. The bill having fallen due, and being unpaid, the landlord presented a petition to the Sheriff for warrant to sell the stock to an amount sufficient to pay the rent and expenses. The Sheriff —no appearance being made for the tenant—granted warrant to sell so much of the stock as would meet the debt and expenses of process and sale, and the sale was carried out, and the proceedings reported to the Sheriff by the person appointed by him as judge of the roup. The tenant thereafter raised an action of damages against the landlord, on the grounds (1) that the warrant of sale was illegal, as being granted while he was still tenant of the grazing and in possession of the stock; (2) that in any view it was illegally carried out since the stock had been sold in an improper manner, and to an extent greatly exceeding the amount of the debt; (3) that the defender had verbally agreed, before the sale began, to accept a certain sum as in full of his debt and expenses, which sum was to be sent for from a neighbouring bank by a friend of the tenant who was present, and had only to send for the money, but that the defender had broken this agreement and instructed the sale to be proceeded with, without allowing time for the money to be brought, the result being, as the pursuer averred, that his stock was sacrificed at a low price, and his credit much injured. The Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) dismissed the action as irrelevant. Kennedy v. Creyk, Dec. 6, 1887, p. 118.

MANDATARY. See Agent and Client—Process, 6.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Antenuptial contract.

1. Opinion, per Lord Watson, that a deed in the form of an antenuptial marriage-contract might receive effect as such if signed immediately after the marriage ceremony.

Per Lord Macnaghten,—"I should venture to doubt whether a contract executed after the status of the contracting party had been definitely altered by marriage could be regarded as an antenuptial contract." Cooper v. Cooper, Feb. 24, 1888, H. L., p. 21.

Construction—Implication.

2. In the construction of a marriage-contract, held that to extend by implication from other clauses in the deed an obligation by the father of the lady to provide for the children of the marriage to events not expressly contemplated by the clause of obligation, the inference must be very clear. Dolphin's Trustees v. Baxter, June 12, 1888, p. 733.

Testament and subsequent marriage-contract—Revocation.

3. In 1879 a lady, then a widow, executed a settlement by which she conveyed her whole estates to executors, directing them to pay certain legacies, specific and general, and to divide the residue among three charitable institutions named. In 1886 she entered into a second marriage, and by antenuptial contract on the occasion of that marriage she, on her part, conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging to her, or which she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, to trustees, who were directed to hold the estate for her behoof in liferent, and to hold

"the capital of the said estate for behoof of such person or persons and on such terms and payable at such periods as the second party may appoint by any writing under her hand, however informally executed, and failing such appointment the trustees shall hold the said capital for behoof of the second party's nearest heirs in mobilibus whomsoever." The lady died about a year after her marriage, survived by her husband, and leaving the settlement of 1879, but no other writing except the marriage-contract. The capital of the estate had been delivered to the marriage-contract trustees, but at her death the lady was in possession of a considerable accumulation of income, paid partly before and partly after her marriage, and of some jewellery and personal belongings. In a question between the beneficiaries under the deed of 1879 and the lady's heirs in mobilibus, as beneficiaries under the marriage-contract, held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the deed of 1879 was not effectual either as an independent settlement or as an appointment under the marriage-contract, but was absolutely revoked by the marriage-contract, which on a sound construction was to be taken as a settlement of the lady's entire estate as existing at her death, and that her heirs in mobilibus, as legatees under the marriage-contract, had right thereto. Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee, March 10, 1888, p. 512.

Acquiescence—Trust.

4. Spouses raised an action against the trustees under their marriage-contract for repayment, with interest, of sums expended out of the wife's estate, on the ground that the payments were ultra vires of the trustees. Held that, even assuming the payments to have been ultra vires, the action was barred by the fact that the wife had been a party to an agreement which embodied a settlement of the whole transaction.

Opinion (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that the question was one not between beneficiary and trustee, but between truster and trustee, and that the wife being in the position of a truster, and having been in the knowledge of the action of the trustees, was not entitled to dispute it afterwards. Spence v. Boyd, Feb. 7, 1888, p. 376.

Vesting.

5. In an antenuptial marriage-contract the husband bound himself to pay an annuity of £150 to his wife, if she survived him, and to pay £4000 to the children of the marriage at the first term after the death of the survivor of the spouses. In security of these provisions he bound himself to convey to trustees an insurance policy for £4000, declaring that if he should predecease his wife the trustees should have power to purchase an annuity of £150 for her, and that the children's provisions should in that event be restricted to the balance of the £4000, and be payable to them at majority or marriage. It was further provided that in the event of there being no children, or of all predeceasing the survivor of the spouses, without lawful issue, the sum should be held for the husband's own heirs and assignees. There were children of the marriage, which was dissolved by the death of the husband. Held that the right of the children vested at his death. Murray's Trustees v. Bloxsom's Trustees, Dec. 22, 1887, p. 233.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Wrongous dismissal—Disobedience to orders—Coachman.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Choosing of Curators—Procedure in vacation.
1. Held that the authority given by sec. 93 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to grant decrees in absence in vacation extends to actions of choosing curators. Hay v. Hay, Sept. 21, 1887, p. 1.
Minor—Capacity to contract—Foreign—Domicile.
2. When a contract is executed in a country by a person domiciled there who by the law of the country has not the capacity to contract, the contract will not be valid in any country. Cooper v. Cooper, Feb. 24, 1888, H. L., p. 21.
Tutor—Aliment and education out of capital—Nobile officium.
3. Circumstances in which the Court allowed a mother as tutor to her pupil children to repay to herself out of the capital belonging to them a sum expended by her on their maintenance and education, and further, to take an additional sum annually until the majority of the eldest child for their maintenance and education. Milne, Feb. 11, 1888, p. 437.
Tutor—Mother's second marriage—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.
4. Held that the fact of a mother entering into a second marriage does not affect her right under the above statute to be guardian to her children by the first marriage. Campbell v. Maquay, June 27, 1888, p. 784. See Parent and Child, 5.
Curator bonis—Special powers—Unauthorised expenditure.
5. A curator bonis to a minor held personally liable for expenditure in rebuilding the mansion-house on his ward's estate, incurred without special powers, but reserving to him any claim he might be able to establish in respect of any benefit accruing to the ward's estate in consequence of the said expenditure. PARENT AND CHILD. Custody—Illegitimate child—Mother's right.
1. While the mother is the only person who has a legal title to the custody of an illegitimate child the Court are bound to consider the interests of the child in any question as to its custody.
Circumstances in which a petition at the instance of the mother for the custody of her illegitimate child was refused. Sutherland v. Taylor, Dec. 22, 1887, p. 224.
Custody—Child placed voluntarily in charge of charitable institution.
2. A father voluntarily placed his child, aged ten months, in the hands of the directors of a charitable institution for children. Ten months afterwards the father petitioned the Court for an order on the directors to deliver it to him. The Court being satisfied that the welfare of the child would suffer if it were restored to its parents, in the special circumstances of the case refused the petition. Markey v. Colston, July 14, 1888, p. 921.
Custody—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 5.
3. A widow who had three children by her first marriage—two girls and a boy—married a British subject who was engaged in business in Florence, and she and her husband thereafter permanently settled there. A petition at her instance to have her daughters, who were in pupillarity, delivered to her was resisted by their uncle, their tutor-nominate, with whom they were at that time residing in Scotland. The Court, having regard to the provisions of the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, granted the prayer of the petition. Maquay v. Campbell, March 17, 1888, p. 606. See Minor and Pupil, 4.

Custody—Illegitimate child—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

4. Question, whether the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, applies to bastards. Brand v. Shaws, Feb. 24, 1888, p. 449.

Action for custody of bastard—Title to sue—Personal and intransmissible.

5. Held that an action at the instance of a mother for custody of her bastard child could not be insisted in after her death by a person named by her in a testament as "tutor, curator, and guardian" to her child. Brand v. Shaws, Feb. 24, 1888, p. 449.

Trust—Separate maintenance of child.

6. A truster directed his trustees to pay to his wife, if she survived him, a certain annuity, and to permit her to have the occupation during her lifetime of a dwelling-house and the use of the furniture therein, declaring that she "shall out of the foresaid provisions educate and maintain my children . . . in a way befitting their station in life, until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, or, if daughters, be married." He was survived by his wife and by several sons and daughters of that and of a prior marriage. The settlement left undisposed of part of the income and most of the capital of his estate, which was of considerable amount. Held that one of the daughters of the first marriage, who was over twenty-one years of age, and desired to live apart from the widow, was not entitled under the settlement to a separate maintenance out of the widow's annuity, it being sufficient implement of the widow's obligation that she offered to maintain the daughter in family with her in the dwelling-house left by the truster. Barry's Trustees v. Barry, March 2, 1888, p. 496.

PARTNERSHIP. Public Company—Promotion money—Payments to a firm, one of whom was a director—Right to retain against firm.

1. A mine-owner in San Francisco entered into an agreement with a firm of merchants there to pay them the half of any profit upon the sale of the mine in Great Britain. B, a partner of the firm, subsequently introduced the seller to purchasers in Great Britain, and although he took no part in deciding as to the purchase his name appeared in the prospectus of a company which was formed for the purpose of buying and working the mine as a provisional director, and also in the memorandum and articles of association as an original director. He subsequently acted as a director. The agreement between his firm and the seller was never communicated to the shareholders. The firm's share in the purchase price to the extent of £7000 was applied by the company as payments on account of shares which the firm agreed to take. Held that as B had, with the knowledge of his firm, occupied a fiduciary position towards the company in the purchase of the mine, his firm were bound to repay the £7000 to the company. Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co., Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co., Jan. 13, 1888, p. 290.

Liability of assumed partner for debts incurred prior to assumption.

2. When the whole estate of a going concern is taken over by a new partnership, the new partners contributing no capital, and the business being continued on the same footing as before, the presumption is that the liabilities are taken over with the stock, and that the new partnership undertakes liability for all the trade debts previously contracted. Heddle's Executrix v. Marwick & Hourston's Trustee, June 1, 1888, p. 698.

Joint adventure—Contract with individual adventurer.

3. Evidence on which held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that joint adventurers were not parties to a contract of sale entered into by one of their number; that the goods furnished in implement of the contract were not in rem versum of the joint adventure, and therefore that the joint adventurers fell to be assoilzied in an action for the price. far as necessary, to the business, but with the exception that if C, one of the partners, was appointed Sheriff-Clerk of Ayrshire he might give such time as was necessary to the duties of that office, and that on the dissolution of the firm the books should "belong to the senior resident partner at the time." C became Sheriff-clerk of Ayrshire. On the dissolution of the firm, C was senior partner. Held, after a proof (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that C was "resident" in Edinburgh within the meaning of the contract, and that, therefore, the books of the firm belonged to him. Blair v. Hunters, July 20, 1888, p. 1094.

PATENT. Specification—Construction—Disconformity between provisional and complete specification.

1. The specification of a patent for improvements in treating oils and fats claimed as a novelty of the invention :—1. The subjecting of oils and fats in shallow layers to the joint action of air and heat; 2. The combining of oxidised or thickened vegetable or animal oils or fats with mineral oils, so as to form a lubricant with little tendency to thicken. In an action for damages for infringement of the patent against an oil manufacturer who combined oxidised or thickened vegetable and animal oils with mineral oils in order to form a lubricant, and thickened the vegetable and animal oils through the influence of air and heat, but by a different process from that described by the pursuer in his patent, held, after a proof, (1) that if the first head of the pursuer's claim in his patent was to be construed as a claim to a process there had been no infringement, the defender's process being different; if it was to be construed as a claim to a product the patent was invalid for want of novelty, oxidised or thickened animal and vegetable oils having been well known long prior to the date of the patent; (2) that the patent was invalid on the further ground that the complete specification claimed more than the provisional specification, in respect that the second head of the claim in the complete specification claimed as part of the invention the combination of thickened animal and vegetable oils with mineral oils irrespective of the process by which the thickening had been effected, whereas the provisional specification was limited to the thickening of vegetable and mineral oils in the particular manner therein described; and (3) that the patent was also invalid on the ground that the mixing of animal and vegetable with mineral oils either required no invention, or, if it did, that the process had not been disclosed. Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers, May 24, 1888, p. 644.

Infringement—Prior use—Trade secret.

2. In an action of damages for infringement of a patent the defenders pleaded, inter alia, prior use, and in support of that plea adduced a witness from the firm of manufacturers from whom they had bought the articles said to constitute the infringement. This witness deponed that his firm had been in the habit of manufacturing the articles for many years before the date of the pursuer's patent, but that they had kept their process "to themselves" as long as they could, and it appeared that it did not become a matter of public knowledge until after the date of the pursuer's patent. Held that the patent was invalid by reason of prior use. Hutchison, Main, & Co. v. Pattullo Brothers, May 24, 1888, p. 644.

Infringement—Damages.

3. In an action brought by a manufacturer, who held a patent for a machine for making horse-shoe nails of a special description, against another manufacturer, for damages arising from the sale by him of nails of the same description made by a machine which to a limited extent infringed the pursuers' patent, the defender, while admitting the sale of a certain quantity of nails which had been produced by the pirated machine, maintained that as he could have manufactured the same kind of nails by other machinery without infringing the patent, the pursuer had suffered no loss by the sale, and that the damage was nominal. Held (rev. judgment of the First Division) (1) that the defender was liable for the loss sustained by the pursuer by the Road—Exposing goods to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers—Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862, sec. 134.

2. Held that a shopkeeper who was proved to have had, during a whole day, a quantity of drapery goods hung over the front of his shop, except the windows, so that the goods projected over the footway of the street to an extent varying from six to eleven inches, within six feet from the level of the footway, had rightly been convicted of a contravention of the above enactment, although it was not proved that any persons had actually been obstructed by the goods. Taylor v. Lamb, Nov. 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 18.

Police Commissioners—Power of committees to delegate to subcommittee—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 63—Dundee Police and Improvement Act, 1882.

3. Under the powers conferred by sec. 63 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, incorporated with the Dundee Police Act, 1882, the Dundee Police Commissioners appointed a works committee to superintend the building of houses, &c. This committee had no express power under the general or local Act to delegate its powers. The committee remitted certain plans to a "subcommittee" of their number. The subcommittee issued a deliverance in name of "the Commissioners" disapproving the plans. On appeal, held that the works committee had no power to delegate its powers, and that therefore the deliverance fell to be quashed. Thomson v. Dundee Police Commissioners, Dec. 8, 1887, p. 164.

Failure to light common stair—Prosecution of factor as owner—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 5.

4. Held that under the above provision a person who, as factor, drew the rents and otherwise managed a tenement with a common stair, the owner of which was resident in Edinburgh, had rightly been convicted of a contravention of section 95 of the Act, in respect that he had, "as owner" of the stair, failed to provide the necessary supply of gas for lighting it. Forbes v. Linton, Nov. 10, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 19.

POOR. Settlement—Proof—Parish Register.

1. In an action of relief of a pauper's aliment brought against one of the two parishes in which a town was situate, it was proved that the pauper was born in the town in 1811. The only evidence that the pauper was born in the defender's parish was an entry of the birth and baptism in the Register of Births and Baptisms kept for that parish, and an entry in a register of baptisms kept by the minister of a chapel of ease within the parish. Held that there was sufficient proof that the pauper had been born in the parish. Lemon v. Wallace, Nov. 26, 1887, p. 92.

Residential settlement—Retention of settlement.

2. A husband died within four years after removing with his family from the parish of M, in which he had a residential settlement. His widow became chargeable in another parish sometime after the four years of absence from M had expired. Held that the derivative settlement in M which accrued to the widow on her husband's death had not been retained after the expiration of four years and a day from the time of removing from M. Caldwell v. Glass, Dec. 9, 1887, p. 166.

Settlement—Lunatic.

3. In an action brought by a relieving parish against the parish of the pauper's birth, it was pleaded in defence that the pauper, in respect of idiocy and imbecility, was incapable of having a settlement other than her father's. It was proved that the pauper, a woman twenty-four years of age, was a congenital imbecile, but not an idiot, that she was incapable of earning a living, and could not learn either to write or to go a message, and that she could not dress herself or do ordinary housework without superintendence. The Court held on the proof that she was not in such mental condition as to be a perpetual pupil, and therefore was capable of having a settlement of her own, which, in the circumstances, was that of her birth. Nixon v. Rowand, Dec. 20, 1887, p. 191.

Process. Summons—Signeting of summons—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

1. Where jurisdiction is to be founded against a foreigner by letters of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, it is not necessary to execute them before the summons is signeted.

Opinions that it is enough that they be executed before defences are lodged.

Observations (per the Lord President) on the legal significance of the signeting of a summons. Walls' Trustees v. Drynan, Feb. 1, 1888, p. 359.

Summons—Commencement of action.

2. Held that the date of the commencement of an action is the date of the execution of the summons. Alston v. Macdougall, Nov. 18, 1887, p. 78.

Summons—Misnomer in summons.

3. A small-debt summons was raised against "William Cruickshanks," and was served personally on William Vincent Cruickshank, who did not defend the action. Decree was obtained and a charge given thereon, and a poinding followed. William Vincent Cruickshank then brought an action to have the sale under the poinding interdicted, and for damages, on the ground that his name was "William Vincent Cruickshank," that he was not the William Cruickshanks who was the pursuer's debtor, and that he had intimated by letter when the summons was served that he knew nothing of the alleged debt. Held that he ought to have defended the action, and that his action came too late. Cruickshank v. Gow & Sons, Jan. 25, 1888, p. 326.

Execution—Registered letter—Citation Amendment Act, 1882, sec. 3.

4. Held that when a person is cited in an action by the posting of a registered letter in terms of sec. 3 of the Citation Amendment Act, 1882, the date of posting is the date of execution. Alston v. Macdougall, Nov. 18, 1887, p. 78.

All parties not called—Company—Action for registration of transfer.

5. The transferee of stock in a railway company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to register the transfer. The company in defence averred that the transferor had instructed them not to register the transfer, on the ground that the transferee was "illegally disposing of" the transferor's stock; and pleaded "all parties are not called." The Court held that it was not necessary to call the transferor as a defender in the action, but in respect that the action had not been formally intimated to him ordained the defenders to transmit to him a copy of the record and a copy of the interlocutor certifying him that if he failed within eight days to state objections to the registration of the transfer, judgment would be pronounced against the defenders. Shaw v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 7, 1888, p. 504.

Thom v. Andrew, June 26, 1888, p. 780.

Leave to reclaim—Allowance of proof—Remit to man of skill—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28—A. S., 10*th March* 1870, sec. 2.

8. In a case where a remit was made by the Lord Ordinary to a man of skill the Court held that as the interlocutor was one which virtually settled the mode of proof of at least a part of the case, it was of the class of interlocutors which might be reclaimed against without leave within six days of its date. Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited, June 22, 1888, p. 776.

Procedure in vacation—Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 57.

9. The powers conferred upon the Court by the 57th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, for the appointment of an interim judicial factor cannot be exercised by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation. Broad v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co., March 20, 1888, p. 615.

Procedure in vacation—Choosing of curators—Decree in absence—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 93.

10. Held that the authority given by sec. 93 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to grant decrees in absence in vacation extends to actions of choosing curators. Hay v. Hay, Sept. 21, 1887, p. 1.

Expenses—Modification—Suspender not insisting in suspension.

11. While a note of suspension of a charge upon a bond and disposition in security was in the Bill-Chamber, the complainer, in respect of the decision of the Inner-House refusing a petition for recall of an inhibition used by the charger, which raised the same question as the suspension, moved the Lord Ordinary to refuse the note. The Lord Ordinary refused the note, found the complainer liable in expenses, and modified the same to five guineas. The respondent reclaimed. The Court held (following Hare v. Stein, June 8, 1882, 9 R. 910) that the Lord Ordinary was entitled to modify the expenses, and in the circumstances refused to alter the sum at which he had modified them. Clarke v. M'Nab, May 26, 1888, p. 670.

Expenses—Interlocutor.

12. An interlocutor awarding expenses without qualification gives expenses as between party and party, and after the Court has pronounced such an interlocutor it is too late to move for expenses as between agent and client. Fletcher's Trustees v. Fletcher, July 7, 1888, p. 862.

See Expenses.

Proof—Diligence—Action of damages for personal injuries—Defender's right to recover pursuer's business books and income-tax receipts.

13. In an action of damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained through the defenders' fault, in which the pursuer alleged that his business had suffered from his inability to attend to it owing to the injuries, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the pursuer's business books for the preceding four years, and his income-tax receipts for the same period. The Court refused the motion. Craig v. North British Railway Co., July 3, 1888, p. 808.

Proof—Diligence for citing havers—Arbitration.

14. Where one of the parties to an arbitration presented a petition to the Court for warrant to cite witnesses to appear before a commissioner and produce documents conform to specification annexed, the Court refused the petition, holding that the approval of the arbiters to the specification ought first to have been obtained. Crichton v. North British Railway Co., June 26, 1888, p. 784.

Proof—Remit to man of skill—Consent.

15. In an action brought for recovery of an alleged balance of the price of certain contract railway work, the question relating to the construction and scope of a written agreement, the Lord Ordinary made a remit to a man of skill to report "whether the railway as executed is covered by the contract . . . or whether it differs from the work contemplated . . . in whole or in part, and that to such extent and degree that the schedule prices cannot be fairly applied to the work as executed." The defenders reclaimed and asked for a proof. The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and allowed a proof,—holding that as the remit involved questions of law as well as fact, it was inexpedient, if not incompetent, to make it without the consent of parties. Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited, June 22, 1888, p. 776.

Jury trial—New trial—Reparation—Juryman visiting locus during progress of trial—Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 42, sec. 6.

16. During a jury trial in an action of damages at the instance of a workman who was injured in a colliery, evidence was led on 21st and 24th January. On the 23d one of the jury went by himself to inspect the locus of the accident, and the method of working the colliery. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. The defender moved the Court to grant a new trial, in terms of sec. 6 of the Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 42, on the ground that the conduct of the juryman had rendered it impossible for the jury to return a verdict according to the evidence led before them. The Court granted a new trial. Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Co., Limited, March 2, 1888, p. 494.

Jury trial—New trial—Surprise.

17. In an action against road trustees for damages for the death of a child about three years of age, which had crept under a fence on the public road and had been drowned in a burn, through the alleged fault of road trustees in not duly fencing the road, the only defence on record was that the road was sufficiently fenced, and that the child had been negligently allowed by the pursuer, her father, to wander about unattended at the place in question. The pursuer's evidence shewed that there had been other accidents to children at that place, and that he had felt apprehension with regard to it, but he did not prove that he had given any notice of the danger to the defenders. The jury found for the defenders "on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, who, while living in fear of the burn, made no complaint to any authority as to the danger." The pursuer moved for a rule for a new trial on the ground that the contributory negligence which the jury had found proved had not been averred, and that he had therefore been taken by surprise. The Court refused a rule. Murray v. County of Middle Ward of Lanark Road Trustees, June 12, 1888, p. 737.

Jury trial—New trial—Excessive damages.

18. A widow brought an action of damages for the death of her husband, resulting from personal injuries caused by the defenders. He was a builder by trade, and his whole income from that and other sources amounted to £150. The widow was left unprovided for. The jury awarded her £900. On a motion for a new trial the Court held the award excessive, and reduced it to £500. Wallace v. West Calder Co-operative Society, Limited, Jan. 13, 1888, p. 307.

Jury trial—Employers Liability Act, 1880—Notice of injury.

19. Held that the question whether the excuse offered by a pursuer, suing for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, for omitting to send notice of the injury to the employer in terms of sec. 4, is reasonable, may be decided by the Court at the adjustment of issues, or may in their discretion be postponed for the decision of the Judge who tries the cause. Trail v. Kelman & Co., Oct. 22, 1887, p. 4.

Special Case—Competency.

22. In a special case presented by the Greenock Harbour Trustees and by certain classes of lenders holding assignments under the different Acts of the Trust, it was stated that the funds of the Trust "were not at Whitsunday last and have not since been adequate to meet the repayments of certain loans then and since payable, and the payments of interest due in respect of money borrowed." The Court entertained the case and decided questions of preference raised therein. Greenock Harbour Trustees, Jan. 31, 1888, p. 343.

Appeal—Competency—Interlocutor limiting proof to writ or oath—Sheriff Court (Scotland) Act, 1853, sec. 24.

23. A Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor sustaining a plea for the defender of prescription, and limiting the proof to his writ or oath. The pursuer appealed. Held that the Sheriff's judgment was not a final interlocutor within the meaning of the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 24, and was therefore not appealable. Wilson v. Brakenridge, March 15, 1888, p. 587.

Appeal—Competency—Cessio—Debtors Act, 1880.

24. An interlocutor by a Sheriff in a process of cessio under the Debtors Act, 1880, reviewing a trustee's deliverance, and ranking a claimant, may competently be appealed to the Court of Session. Taylor's Trustee v. Paul, Jan. 24, 1888, p. 313.

Appeal—Competency—Election of trustee in bankruptcy—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 71.

25. At a meeting of creditors for the election of a trustee in a sequestration, creditors to the value of £15,000 voted for A and creditors to the value of £1600 voted for B. Objections were taken by creditors to certain votes for A. The Sheriff-substitute sustained an objection to the vote of X, a creditor for £16, who had proposed A, and, on the ground that A had been proposed by a creditor who was not entitled to vote, declared B to have been duly elected. An appeal by A to the Court of Session was objected to on the ground that by sec. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act the Sheriff's judgment was final. Held that the appeal was competent, and that the interlocutor must be recalled, on the ground that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction—the Lord President holding that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in failing to ascertain the number of valid votes for each candidate—Lord Shand holding that the Sheriff's jurisdiction was limited to disposing of objections stated to him—Lord Adam concurring on both grounds. Farquharson v. Sutherlands, June 16, 1888, p. 759.

Appeal—Appeal for Jury Trial—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 40.

26. It is incompetent to remove a Sheriff Court cause to the Court of Session under the 40th section of the Judicature Act while the interlocutor allowing a proof is under appeal to the Sheriff. M'Arthur v. Boucher, Dec. 6, 1887, p. 117.

PROOF. Onus—Agent and Client—Reparation—Alleged failure of agent to inform client of material fact.

1. B, a law-agent, was employed by a client to obtain a loan on the security of a patent. S, another client of B, after consulting B, lent £5000. The patent was subsequently found to be invalid, having been anticipated by prior patents. In an action raised by S against B for payment of loss through the transaction, on the ground that the defender had failed to communicate to the pursuer the fact that he had ascertained that the patent could not be relied on as valid without further inquiry than had been made, and had allowed him to advance his money in ignorance of this risk, held (rev. judgment of First Division) (1) that the onus of proving that the communication had not been made lay upon the pursuer; and (2) on the proof (diss. the Lord Chancellor) that the pursuer had failed to discharge himself of this onus, and that from the facts proved and documents produced it was to be inferred that B did make the communication to his client. M'Clure, Naismith, Brodie, & Macfarlane, v. Stewart, July 22, 1887, H. L., p. 1.

2. When in a testamentary deed the signature bearing to be that of the testator was written on an erasure, but was otherwise ex facie duly tested, and the deed was challenged as vitiated in essentialibus, held that the deed was ex facie probative, and that the onus was consequently on the party challenging it to prove either that the signature was not genuine, or, if genuine, that it had not been duly tested. The proof on these points having failed, deed sustained. Brown v. Duncan, March 9, 1888, p. 511.

Onus—Restrictions on building—Common feuing plan—Loss of plan.

3. A feu-charter, dated in 1825, providing for the erection of a tenement in a town, declared that it should not be in the power of the feuar to make any deviation from or alteration of a plan of the tenement, signed as relative to the feu-charter, "all which it is hereby specially provided may be stopped, demolished, or removed by us or our foresaids, or by any of the feuars of the said street, at the expense of the feuars offending." The tenement was erected in 1826. In 1887 the proprietor proposed to bring forward the front of the tenement to the line of the street by covering the area. Neighbouring feuars, with a title to object, objected on the ground that the proposed alteration was a deviation from the plan, but the plan itself was lost. Held that, as it was to be presumed that the existing buildings had been erected in conformity with the plan, the onus lay upon the proprietor to shew that the alterations proposed by him were not disconform to the plan. Sutherland v. Barbour, Nov. 17, 1887, p. 62.

Usage of trade.

4. Held that averments of custom of trade cannot be admitted to probation in order to construe a written contract clearly expressed.

A steel company contracted to supply "the whole of the steel required by" a firm of contractors in the building of a bridge, "the estimated quantity of steel to be 30,000 tons, more or less." In an action at the instance of the steel company against the contractors to have it declared that they were entitled to supply, and the defenders were bound to take from them all the steel necessary for the bridge, the contractors averred that according to the custom of the steel trade the contract was a contract only for the estimated quantity, with a margin of variation not exceeding 5 per cent. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the words of the contract being plain and unambiguous the averment was not relevant to be admitted to probation. Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co., Dec. 22, 1887, p. 215.

Parish Register.

5. In an action of relief of a pauper's aliment brought against one of the two parishes in which a town was situate, it was proved that the pauper was born in the town in 1811. The only evidence that the pauper was born in the defender's parish was an entry of the birth and baptism in the Register of Births and Baptisms kept for that parish, and an entry in a register of baptisms kept by the minister of a chapel of ease within the parish. Held that there was sufficient proof that the pauper had been born in the parish. Lemon v. Wallace, Nov. 26, 1887, p. 92.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Evidence of young child.

6. In a proof in an action for divorce on the ground of adultery, the Lord Ordinary rejected the evidence of a boy nearly seven years of age, "in respect of his tender years and of the nature of the case." Opinion that the evidence had rightly been rejected. Robertson v. Robertson, July 20, 1888, p. 1001.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Condonation.

7. In an action of divorce on the ground of adultery, while it is competent to lead evidence of misconduct on the part of the defender prior to condonation in order to shew the character of the defender's subsequent actings, which are admitted or proved as facts, but are in themselves capable of being regarded in different lights, it is not competent to refer to such previous misconduct as evidence of the alleged facts themselves. Robertson v. Robertson, July 20, 1888, p. 1001.

Diligence—Action of damages for personal injuries—Defender's right to recover pursuer's business books and income-tax receipts.

8. In an action of damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained through the defenders' fault, in which the pursuer alleged that his business had suffered from his inability to attend to it owing to the injuries, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the pursuer's business books for the preceding four years, and his income-tax receipts for the same period. The Court refused the motion. Craig v. North British Railway Co., July 3, 1888, p. 808.

PROPERTY. Church—Allocation of seats—Parts and Pertinents.

1. Where seats in a parish church are allocated to heritors according to real rent, they are parts and pertinents of the property in respect of which they are allocated, and cannot be alienated therefrom. Stephen v. Anderson, Nov. 18, 1887, p. 72.

Theatre—Letters-patent—Patrimonial right—Bond and disposition in security—Parts and Pertinents.

2. In 1878 the lessee of a theatre in Glasgow, holding letters-patent granted by the Crown (under the Act 43 Geo. III. c. 142) authorising him, "his executors, administrators, and assigns," to maintain a company of players in a certain theatre in Glasgow, or any other theatre in a suitable place in Glasgow, for a certain term of years, assigned the letters-patent to the proprietor of the theatre. Subsequently the proprietor granted a bond and disposition in security for £13,000, which conveyed the subjects with the "parts, pertinents, and privileges thereof." The bondholders having entered into possession, let the theatre to a new tenant. Their lessee having continued to produce stage plays, and having no licence to do so except in so far as he had right to the letters-patent, the proprietor brought an action against him and the bondholders to have them interdicted from producing stage plays in the theatre in virtue of the licence in the letters-patent, the right to which he maintained was still in him. The Court held that the pursuer had no title to sue, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young on the ground that the licence in the letters-patent was not a right of property separable from the theatre, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark on the ground that the pursuer had, by granting the bond and disposition in security, divested himself of his right to the letters-patent. Yuille v. Rushbury, July 4, 1888, p. 828.

Title—Sale—Possession.

3. In 1880 two adjoining feus were sold by public roup, Martin purchasing one, and Balderston the other. In 1885 Balderston sold his feu to Ross, and in 1886 Ross raised an action against Martin for declarator that a portion of the feu possessed by Martin belonged to him (Ross).

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear) that as the subjects in dispute were within the pursuer's and not within the defender's title, as recorded, the pursuer as a singular successor could not be affected by such personal exceptions arising from the terms of the articles of roup and the possession since the roup, as might have been pleaded against his author Balderston, and therefore that he was entitled to decree as concluded for. Ross v. Martin, Jan. 12, 1888, p. 282.

Title—Notarial instrument—Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, secs. 3 and 19.

4. By trust-disposition for behoof of creditors, Yeaman the truster conveyed “to and in favour of John Shields” (designed) “and as trustees, to act in succession as after mentioned; whom failing, to such person or persons as I may appoint by any writing under my hand validly executed, as trustees . . . and to the assignees of the said trustees or trustee, All and Sundry my whole means, estate, and effects, heritable and moveable.” Power was given to the trustee, inter alia, to take possession of the whole trust-estate, to complete titles thereto, and to sell the whole or any part thereof. Shields accepted, but without having made up a title to any of the truster's heritable properties, he, after having acted for a few months, resigned by minute of resignation endorsed on the trust-disposition. Yeaman thereupon, on the narrative of the trust-disposition and of the minute of resignation, nominated Buchan “as trustee under the said trust-deed, with full power, by himself alone, to manage and execute the trust thereby created, in the same manner and as fully and freely in every respect as if the said trust-deed had been granted in favour of him the said Thomas Buchan as sole trustee, and that for the purposes, and with the powers, and subject to the declarations and provisions contained in the said trust-deed.” Buchan's agent made up a title by notarial instruments bearing to be in terms of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868. The notarial instruments, which were duly recorded, set out the sasine under which Yeaman was infeft, the trust-disposition in favour of Shields, and the deed of nomination in favour of Buchan. Buchan (for the purpose of having the validity of the title determined by the Court) refused payment of his agent's account on the ground that the notarial instruments did not form a valid title in his favour, in respect (1) that Shields had a personal right to the properties and had never divested himself thereof; (2) that the case did not fall within the provisions of the Act of 1868; (3) that the trust-disposition and the minute of appointment did not constitute a valid warrant for completing Buchan's title by notarial instrument; and (4) that even if it were competent to complete Buchan's title by notarial instrument, the notarial instruments were insufficient, inasmuch as the minute of resignation was not set forth as one of the warrants of instruments, such minute being an essential link in the progress of titles. The other party maintained that the titles had been validly completed in terms of the 19th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, as interpreted by the 3d section of the same Act. In a special case held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the titles had been validly completed, and that the agent was entitled to payment of his account. Kerr's Trustee v. Yeaman's Trustee, March 9, 1888, p. 520.

Burden on entailed property—Disentail—Bridge—Acquiescence of subsequent heirs.

5. The heir of entail in possession of K, an estate situated on the north bank of a river, in 1858 granted permission (not in writing) to M, the proprietor of lands on the other bank and tenant of the shootings on the entailed estate, to build over the river a carriage bridge, one of the abutments of which rested on part of the entailed lands. The bridge was connected by a good road, forty-five yards long, with a public road which ran along the north bank. The succeeding heir of entail, who in 1884 disentailed the estate, did not object to the continued use of the bridge by M. In 1885, after the death of the disentailer, M assigned the remainder of his lease of the shootings over K to W, who shortly thereafter placed a deer fence across the access to the bridge on the north side. In an action against M at the instance of W and the fee-simple proprietor of K, who up to that time had not objected to M's use of the bridge, for declarator that they were entitled to have the use of the bridge discontinued, held that M's right to the use of the bridge rested on sufferance only, and that, therefore, the pursuers were entitled to declarator that he was not entitled to continue to use it. Winans v. Lord Tweedmouth, March 10, 1888, p. 540.

Common property—Common interest—Alteration of buildings.

6. The proprietor of a shop in an area and of a dwelling-house above, the latter being on the street level, and both forming part of the same tenement, petitioned the Dean of Guild for authority to bring forward his dwelling-house to the line of the street. The petitioner's title was a disposition to "All and Whole that shop and dwelling-house in . . . together with a cellar in the front area . . . together also with a right in common with" the other proprietors of the tenement "to the solum of the piece of ground upon which the foresaid shop and dwelling-house are built." The other cellars in the area were the property of certain of these upper proprietors of the tenement. Held that the petitioner was not proprietor of the area, and that the other proprietors were entitled to object to his proposed alterations. Sutherland v. Barbour, Nov. 17, 1887, p. 62.

Reparation—Nuisance—Neighbourhood.

7. The purchaser of a quantity of fallen timber in a plantation in the course of removing the timber dragged it across a stream which flowed through the plantation and fed a salmon-hatchery below. The result was that the stream became fouled, and that the ova in the hatchery were destroyed. In an action of damages by the proprietor of the hatchery against the purchaser of the timber, it was proved that the latter had continued his operations after he became aware of their probable consequences to the ova, but was willing to take any reasonable precautions which did not materially impede the removal of the timber, he being under contract with the proprietor of the plantation to remove the timber within a limited time. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the pursuer was not entitled to damages, the defender having followed the ordinary method of carrying out an ordinary and legitimate operation. Armistead v. Bowerman, July 3, 1888, p. 814.

River—Servitude—Water rights.

8. B., who was proprietor of the lands surrounding Loch H., and on both sides of Loch H. Burn for some distance after it left the loch, in 1854 disponed to D., an inferior heritor, along with two mills on Loch H. Burn, his "whole rights of water and water-power, and other rights connected with the mills hereby disponed, including all right" he had "to dam up and draw water from Loch H., or to form embankments or breast-works at said loch," but so that the water of the loch should not be raised more than three feet above its then existing level. At the same time he expressly reserved his rights in the foresaid loch and burn, excepting his rights therein connected with the mills and "other rights above conveyed or granted," and particularly his right to use the water-power for driving agricultural machinery. In 1883 the Water-works Commissioners of the burgh of Dumbarton obtained compulsory powers to take the water of Loch H. for the supply of the inhabitants, but their special Act provided that they must discharge into Loch H. Burn a regular supply of 320,000 gallons a-day, which should "be deemed to be compensation to mill-owners and other persons interested in the waters flowing down the stream called Loch H. Burn for the water intercepted and appropriated for the purposes of this Act"; and also that "nothing in this Act contained shall be held to prejudice or affect the rights (if any) of B. in the loch known as Loch H., or to prevent him from claiming" from the Commissioners compensation for any such rights which should be injuriously affected by their operations. The Commissioners acquired by private agreement all the rights of D. in Loch H. and Loch H. Burn. B. claimed compensation, not only for land taken and wayleave, but for rights and interests in the water of the loch and burn injuriously affected. Held that the grant of servitude to D. was limited to the use of water for the mills, and that the Water Commissioners were bound to compensate B. for the water withdrawn from the loch for the supply of the town of Dumbarton. Lord Blantyre v. Water-Works Commissioners of Dumbarton, May 11, 1888, H. L., p. 56.

PUBLIC BURDENS. Clause of relief—Lease—Expositio Contemporanea.

Where the parties to a long lease had for a long period of years acted on a particular construction of obligations of relief of public burdens, held that such construction must be regarded as the true meaning of the obligation, and receive effect accordingly. Jopp's Trustees v. Edmond, Jan. 11, 1888, p. 271.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Common lodging-house—Right of officer of Local Authority to inspect—Public Health Act, 1867, sec. 68.

1. The keeper of a common lodging-house, on access to his house being demanded by two officers of the Local Authority, refused access (1) to a room which opened off a licensed room, and could only be entered through it—(this room had not been observed when the premises were inspected with a view to licence being granted, and was not itself licensed); (2) to two rooms which were licensed, but which he had shut off entirely from the rest of the house, which had a separate access to the street, and which, after giving notice to the Local Authority that he had ceased to use them as part of the lodging-house, he had let to a monthly tenant. Held that in refusing access to the first-mentioned room he had contravened the above statute.

Opinions, that in refusing access to the other two rooms he had not contravened the statute, but that his conduct in doing so would have justified the magistrates in cancelling the licence. Gunn v. Cadenhead, May 25, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 57.

Burgh—Drainage—Public Health Act, 1867, secs. 77 and 108—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, sec. 7.

2. A paper manufacturer, whose works were within a burgh and who was liable for drainage assessment, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court, founding on the 77th section of the Public Health Act, 1867, and the 7th section of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, to have the local authority ordained to allow him to empty the drains containing the discharge from his works into the burgh sewers. The defenders, founding on the latter section, stated that the discharge in question would "prejudicially affect" their sewers and the quality of their sewage, and unduly increase the volume of the total discharge in its application to their sewage farm.

Held, upon a report by men of skill, that the defenders had failed to prove that the quality of the discharge was such as would "prejudicially affect" the sewers or the sewage in any of the particulars of the section founded on; that the term "application to land" was used in a general and not in a special sense; and that the defenders were bound to receive the discharge into their sewers—provided that their sewage pipes were large enough to carry it. Guthrie, Craig, Peter, & Co. v. Magistrates of Brechin, Feb. 8, 1888, p. 385.

Possession of unsound meat—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 261.

3. Opinions that to obtain a conviction against the occupier of premises for a contravention of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1879, by being in the possession of unsound meat as or for human food, it is not essential to prove that the accused knew either of the meat being in his premises or of its unsound condition. Dickson v. Linton, June 1, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 76.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Certificate—Transfer—Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 19.

the original holder of all right of trafficking in exciseable liquors under the certificate.

A transfer of a public-house certificate running from May 1887 till May 1888 was granted in July 1887, but was not confirmed at the ensuing Quarter Sessions in October, the transferee having been guilty of a breach of the certificate. The original holder then resumed possession of the premises, and proceeded to traffic therein in exciseable liquors without obtaining a new certificate. Held that he had been rightly convicted of trafficking in exciseable liquors without a certificate. Miller v. Linton, Feb. 10, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 37.

Railway. Taking of land compulsorily—Expenses—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 119.

A proprietor of lands brought an action against the Crown and against a railway company, concluding for declarator that he had right to the foreshore ex adverso of his lands, and for interdict against the railway company entering upon it. The pursuer obtained decree in his favour in the Court of Session, and in appeals by both defenders to the House of Lords, with a finding against the appellants for costs in the appeals. The railway company having then served on the proprietor a notice under the Lands Clauses Act of their intention to take the foreshore, the latter presented a petition to the House of Lords against the railway company praying that the costs in the appeal should be taxed as between agent and client in terms of section 119 of the Lands Clauses Act. Held that the costs in the railway company's appeal should be taxed as between agent and client. Young v. North British Railway Co., March 8, 1888, H. L., p. 32.

Reparation. Excessive damages—Personal injury.

1. A widow brought an action of damages for the death of her husband, resulting from personal injuries caused by the defenders. He was a builder by trade, and his whole income from that and other sources amounted to £150. The widow was left unprovided for. The jury awarded her £900. On a motion for a new trial the Court held the award excessive, and reduced it to £500. Wallace v. West Calder Co-operative Society, Limited, Jan. 13, 1888, p. 307.

New trial—Juryman visiting locus during progress of trial—Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 42, sec. 6.

2. During a jury trial in an action of damages at the instance of a workman who was injured in a colliery, evidence was led on 21st and 24th January. On the 23d one of the jury went by himself to inspect the locus of the accident, and the method of working the colliery. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer. The defender moved the Court to grant a new trial, in terms of sec. 6 of the Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 42, on the ground that the conduct of the juryman had rendered it impossible for the jury to return a verdict according to the evidence led before them. The Court granted a new trial. Sutherland v. Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Co. Limited, March 2, 1888, p. 494.

Breach of contract—Different actions of damages founded on one breach.

3. A single act, amounting either to a delict or to breach of contract cannot be made the ground of two or more actions for the purpose of recovering damages arising within different periods, but the whole damage present and future must be recovered in one action. Stevenson v. Pontifex & Wood, Dec. 7, 1887, p. 125.

Fraud—Title to sue—Company—Shareholder—Restitutio in integrum.

4. In 1877 a joint stock company was formed to buy an estate in Norway, believed to be valuable for its timber and minerals, at the price of £3800, three-fourths of the price to be paid in cash, the remainder in shares. The vendor guaranteed that the sum so paid in cash should be repaid from sales of timber within four years from the company's entering into possession. The company entered into possession of the estate in 1877, and carried on the sale of timber for two years. The business proved unprofitable, and in 1879 the company entered into an agreement with the vendor by which the parties declared the original contract to be no longer binding on either, and discharged all claims by the one party against the other under it, and the company agreed to pay to the vendor (for salary as manager and advances) a sum of money, and to grant him a mortgage over the estate for a further sum. The company carried on the business till January 1884, when they resolved to sell the estate and to wind up the company. In November 1883 one of the partners raised an action of damages against the vendor for the loss the pursuer had sustained by becoming an original shareholder of the company, on the ground that he had been induced to do so by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the vendor. After a proof, held that fraudulent misrepresentation had not been proved, and that the vendor was not liable, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill further holding that having regard to the proceedings of the company the pursuer had no title to sue, Lord Rutherfurd Clark reserving his opinion. Dunnett v. Mitchell, Dec. 7, 1887, p. 131.

Lease—Urban tenement—Injury to business by operations of neighbouring occupier.

5. Where a tenant of an urban tenement sues his landlord for damages in respect that his rights as occupant have been encroached on by operations carried on by the proprietor of a neighbouring tenement, he must aver, in order to found a relevant action, that he has applied to his landlord to have his rights protected, and that the landlord, in breach of his duty, has refused, or unduly delayed, to protect them. Menzies v. Whyte, Feb. 29, 1888, p. 470.

Lease—House becoming uninhabitable—Liability of landlord for death in tenant's family.

6. Averments in an action by the tenant of a house against the landlord for damages from the house becoming uninhabitable from its insanitary condition, and for solatium on account of the loss of the tenant's two children from the same cause, held irrelevant from want of specification.

Observed (per Lord Young) that where tenants continue to inhabit a house which they believe to be dangerous to health through the fault of the landlord they cannot hold him responsible for any evil consequence arising from the continued occupation. Henderson v. Munn, July 7, 1888, p. 859.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880, secs. 4 and 7—Notice of injury.

7. Held that the question whether the excuse offered by a pursuer, suing for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, for omitting to send notice of the injury to the employer in terms of sec. 4, is reasonable, may be decided by the Court at the adjustment of issues, or may in their discretion be postponed for the decision of the Judge who tries the cause. Trail v. Kelman & Co., Oct. 22, 1887, p. 4.

Master and Servant—Known danger—Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1—"Plant"—Horse.

8. A man who had been in the employment of a carting contractor as carter for several years, was afterwards employed by him as stableman. Some months thereafter he was ordered by his master to tie up a horse which had got loose in its stall. While doing so he was bitten by the horse and severely injured. In an action for damages he averred,—"The horse in question, which was an entire horse, was a vicious and dangerous animal, and on several previous occasions it had attacked, bitten, and severely injured those who were in charge of it." Held that his averments shewed that the pursuer was aware that the horse was vicious, and that he incurred danger by entering its stall when it had got loose, and therefore that his action was irrelevant.

Held (per Lord Adam) that a horse used by a carting contractor in his business is "plant" in the sense of sec. 1 of the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Fraser v. Hood, Dec. 16, 1887, p. 178.

Master and Servant—Defective machinery.

9. A workman was fatally injured while engaged along with others in raising a heavy barrel, which was suspended by a moveable block and tackle from an iron bar laid across a hatchway in the roof of the apartment in which he was working. The iron bar was laid upon two wooden stools, the block and tackle being attached to it by a hook, and the accident took place through the slipping of the bar. The deceased had assisted to adjust the block and tackle on the day of the accident, and on various previous occasions on which the same operation had been conducted with safety during the preceding four years. In an action by his widow and family against the employer, held that, in the circumstances, neither defect in the machinery nor neglect to provide proper appliances had been proved, and defender assoilzied accordingly. Watt v. Neilson & Co., June 21, 1888, p. 772.

Master and Servant—Blasting rock—Defective system of working.

10. In an action by a workman, who had been employed in blasting rock with gunpowder, against his employer for damages on account of personal injury sustained in the course of the employment through the alleged defective system on which the defender carried on the work, the pursuer averred that the gunpowder was stored in a magazine, about five minutes' distance from the work, in small barrels containing about twenty-five pounds of gunpowder each; that when it was desired to fill a charge a barrel of the powder was taken from the store and opened at the work and the required powder taken from it; that while the pursuer was engaged in firing a charge a gust of wind carried a portion of the fuse to the barrel from which the powder had been taken and caused the powder in it to explode, thereby injuring the pursuer; that the system was bad and unnecessarily dangerous; that the usual system was to take the gunpowder from the store in small flasks with narrow orifices, which practically obviated all danger; and that complaints had been made by the workmen to the defender's foreman of the danger of using barrels, which complaints had been unattended to. The Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) dismissed the action as irrelevant. Mulligan v. M'Alpine, June 27, 1888, p. 789.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880.

11. An action of damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, cannot be maintained unless the relation of employer and employed has subsisted between the pursuer and the person against whom the action is laid. Nicolson v. Macandrew & Co., July 7, 1888, p. 854.

Master and Servant—Mason using joiner's scaffolding.

12. A labourer who was employed by Messrs A & B, a firm of masons, in the erection of certain buildings, brought an action of damages for personal injury against Messrs C & D, the principal contractors for the work, alleging that, in order to perform his duty of mixing lime, he had had occasion to fetch his shovel, which he had lent to another mason who was working at some distance from the ground; that in fetching it he ascended a ladder which led on to a scaffolding belonging to the defenders; that when he was passing over the scaffolding it gave way, and he fell to the ground, receiving severe injuries. Held that as it was not alleged that the scaffolding had been erected for the benefit of the masons, or that it had been used by them with the authority or sanction of the defenders, no relevant case was averred, and action accordingly dismissed. Nicolson v. Macandrew & Co., July 7, 1888, p. 854.

Nuisance—Neighbourhood.

13. The purchaser of a quantity of fallen timber in a plantation in the course of removing the timber dragged it across a stream which flowed through the plantation and fed a salmon-hatchery below. The result was that the stream became fouled, and that the ova in the hatchery were destroyed. In an action of damages by the proprietor of the hatchery against the purchaser of the timber, it was proved that the latter had continued his operations after he became aware of their probable consequences to the ova, but was willing to take any reasonable precautions which did not materially impede the removal of the timber, he being under contract with the proprietor of the plantation to remove the timber within a limited time. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the pursuer was not entitled to damages, the defender having followed the ordinary method of carrying out an ordinary and legitimate operation. Armistead v. Bowerman, July 3, 1888, p. 814.

Precautions for safety of public—Pond in place accessible to public.

14. Harbour commissioners in reclaiming land from a river bed in the immediate vicinity of the harbour left a piece of water, about half-an-acre in extent and in some parts over six feet deep, unfenced at a place to which the public had free access. As a boy of sixteen was amusing himself at this place, by floating on a raft which he had made, he fell into the water and was drowned. In an action of damages raised by the boy's father against the harbour commissioners held that no fault had been proved on the part of the defenders, and, therefore, that they were not liable in damages. Forbes v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Jan. 24, 1888, p. 323.

Precautions for safety of public—Fencing of public road—Contributory negligence.

15. In an action against road trustees for damages for the death of a child about three years of age, which had crept under a fence on the public road and had been drowned in a burn, through the alleged fault of road trustees in not duly fencing the road, the only defence on record was that the road was sufficiently fenced, and that the child had been negligently allowed by the pursuer, her father, to wander about unattended at the place in question. The pursuer's evidence shewed that there had been other accidents to children at that place, and that he had felt apprehension with regard to it, but he did not prove that he had given any notice of the danger to the defenders. The jury found for the defenders "on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, who, while living in fear of the burn, made no complaint to any authority as to the danger." The pursuer moved for a rule for a new trial on the ground that the contributory negligence which the jury had found proved had not been averred, and that he had therefore been taken by surprise. The Court refused a rule. Murray v. County of Middle Ward of Lanark Road Trustees, June 12, 1888, p. 737.

Ship—Liability for collision.

16. Where a ship is placed in a position of peril and difficulty by the wrong manœuvring of another ship, and her captain in exercising his best judgment for the safety of his vessel commits an error which causes or contributes to a collision between them, he will not be held in fault. Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees, March 7, 1888, p. 498.

Slander—Innuendo.

17. In an action of damages for slander founded on words not in themselves libellous but innuendoed to be so, the Court will not allow an issue unless the words founded on will fairly bear the innuendo put on them. Fraser v. Morris, Feb. 24, 1888, p. 454.

Slander—Wrongous use of diligence—Publication of decrees of Court of Justice.

18. A debt collector was employed by a creditor to collect a debt. Having failed to do so he employed a law-agent, who used arrestments against the debtor on the dependence of an action subsequently raised in the creditor's name against him in the Sheriff Court. The debtor was then outwith the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and was not duly cited. Decree in absence was obtained, and arrestments in execution used against him. The debt collector then published in a "Commercial Compendium," for which it was alleged he was responsible, a bare statement that the decree had been obtained against the debtor for the amount of the debt in question. The decree in absence was subsequently recalled on the ground of improper citation. In an action for damages at the instance of the debtor against the debt collector for wrongous use of diligence, and wrongful publication of the decree in absence in the knowledge that it had been improperly obtained, held, on the averments, (1) that the defender was merely an intermediary between the client and the law-agent, and was not responsible for the errors of the latter; and (2) that the defender not being responsible for the obtaining of the decree was not liable in damages for publishing the fact that it had been granted. Action dismissed as irrelevant. Taylor v. Rutherford, March 17, 1888, p. 608.

Slander—Privilege—Malice—Words prima facie slanderous spoken by member of public body pertinently to subject before it.

19. At a meeting of police commissioners of a burgh a member, who had heard complaints regarding the conduct of a sheriff-officer who had charge of collecting arrears of water-rates, said in supporting a motion which he made as to employing a different system for the collection of police-rates,—"What could be more repulsive than to demand rates of a dying woman. . . . Sheriff-officers are not always worshippers of the sober deity." On another member expressing his opinion that the sheriff-officer was a competent man, he said,—"A man who is drunk cannot be competent. . . . I would rather let loose a wild beast upon the community than a drunk man." In an action of damages against him by the sheriff-officer for slander the Court found that the defender used the language complained of in the course of his duty as a member of the police commission, and that it was not proved that he wittingly spoke falsely or that he was actuated by malice; and held that he was privileged in expressing himself as he did, in respect that he was versans in officio, and that he was entitled to absolvitor. Shaw v. Morgan, July 11, 1888, p. 865.

Slander—Nominal damages—Expenses.

20. Judge's certificate. Macmillan v. Wilsons, Oct. 25, 1887, p. 6.

Wrongous use of diligence—Lease.

21. A tenant of grazings agreed with his landlord in writing to have a certain amount of stock always on the ground while the rent remained unpaid. He also granted a bill for the rent. The bill having fallen due, and being unpaid, the landlord presented a petition to the Sheriff for warrant to sell the stock to an amount sufficient to pay the rent and expenses. The Sheriff,—no appearance being made for the tenant,—granted warrant to sell so much of the stock as would meet the debt and expenses of process and sale, and the sale was carried out, and the proceedings reported to the Sheriff by the person appointed by him as judge of the roup. The tenant thereafter raised an action of damages against the landlord, on the grounds (1) that the warrant of sale was illegal, as being granted while he was still tenant of the grazing and in possession of the stock; (2) that in any view it was illegally carried out since the stock had been sold in an improper manner, and to an extent greatly exceeding the amount of the debt; (3) that the defender had verbally agreed, before the sale began, to accept a certain sum as in full of his debt and expenses, which sum was to be sent for from a neighbouring bank by a friend of the tenant who was present, and had only to send for the money, but that the defender had broken this agreement and instructed the sale to be proceeded with, without allowing time for the money to be brought, the result being, as the pursuer averred, that his stock was sacrificed at a low price, and his credit much injured. The Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) dismissed the action as irrelevant. Kennedy v. Creyk, Dec. 6, 1887, p. 118.

REPARATION—Continued.

Illegal imprisonment—School Board—Malice.

22. A father was convicted of failure to educate his children upon a complaint at the instance of the compulsory officer of a School Board, and in default of payment of a fine was sentenced to three days' imprisonment, and was imprisoned accordingly. The conviction was quashed by the Court of Justiciary on the ground that neither a certificate under the Act of 1872, nor a sufficient attendance order under the Act of 1883, had been produced to the Sheriff-substitute. The father then brought an action for damages against the School Board, but set forth no specific averments of malice. Held that the error having been committed by a public board in the performance of their duty it was necessary for the pursuer to set forth malice, and action dismissed as irrelevant.

Question (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) whether malice can competently be averred of a public board. Macaulay v. North Uist School Board, Nov. 26, 1887, p. 99.

See Agent and Client, 3, 4.

RETENTION. Retention of documents—Factor—Implied contract.

1. A landed proprietor placed documents relating to his estates in the hands of the factor on his estates, to enable him to discharge his factorial duties. Thereafter he granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. The trustees thereunder applied to the factor for the documents, but he refused to give them up till his salary and account for factorial outlays were paid. Held that he was entitled to retain the documents on the ground of implied contract. Robertson v. Ross, Nov. 17, 1887, p. 67.

2. Company—Promotion Money—Payments to a firm, one of whom was a director. Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited v. Falkner, Bell, & Co., Jan. 13, 1888, p. 290.

REVENUE. Income-Tax—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 105, and sec. 88, Schedule C, Rule Third—Exemption—"Charitable purposes only."

1. The words "charitable purposes," as used in the exempting clauses of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, are to be interpreted in their ordinary and popular signification as meaning the relief of poverty, and do not cover purposes of general benevolence and public utility.

By trust-deed a truster provided a fund of £500,000 for the promotion of religion and the mitigation of the "spiritual destitution" which prevailed "among the poor and working population of Scotland." The income of the fund was principally applied towards the building and endowment of churches. Held that it was not exempt from the payment of income-tax as a "trust established for charitable purposes only," in the sense of the 105th section and sec. 88, schedule C, of the Income-Tax Act, 1842. Baird's Trustees v. Lord Advocate, June 1, 1888, p. 682.

Income-Tax—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, First and Fourth Cases—Profits of trade—Interest on colonial securities.

2. A Scottish limited company carried on the business of woolbrokers in Australia, and made advances of money, which were secured partly upon real property and partly by liens or charges upon wool and other produce in that colony, the advances and interest thence accruing being of fluctuating amounts. Held (distinguishing the case from those of the Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Company of New Mexico, Limited, 14 R. 98, and the Northern Investment Company of New Zealand, Limited, 14 R. 734), that the company fell to be assessed for income-tax only in respect of its whole profits and gains, including the interest received from its investments in foreign and colonial securities, according to the rule contained in the first case of schedule D of the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, and was not chargeable for its income arising from interest on its foreign and colonial securities under the rule contained in the fourth case of schedule D, and for its profits and gains from transactions in the nature

3. A bank was charged with income-tax under schedule A of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, on certain premises belonging to it in which it carried on its business, and which were also to some extent occupied as dwelling-houses by the manager and agents, that accommodation being given by the bank to them as part of their emoluments. In assessing the bank for income-tax under schedule D, the Income-Tax Commissioners refused to allow deduction from the gross profits of the bank of the annual value of these premises, in so far as they were occupied as dwelling-houses. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the bank was entitled to deduct the annual value of the whole premises in question. Russell v. Town and County Bank, April 26, 1888, H. L., p. 51.

Excise and Customs—Removal of uncustomed goods—Seizure of conveyance—Knowledge on part of owner—Customs Laws Consolidation Act, 1876, sec. 202.

4. Held that the mere use of a conveyance or of horses for the removal of uncustomed goods infers forfeiture under the above statute irrespective of the knowledge or consent of the owner thereof. Lord Advocate v. Crookshanks, July 19, 1888, p. 995.

Succession-Duty—Unlet shootings—Succession-Duty Act, 1853, sec. 21.

5. Held that a successor to landed property is subject, under sec. 21 of the Succession-Duty Act, 1853, to succession-duty in respect of unlet shootings. Lord Advocate v. Duke of Buccleuch, Jan. 26, 1888, p. 333.

Succession-Duty—Foreign domicile—Testament creating a British trust.

6. Although moveable property in Scotland belonging to a person domiciled abroad will not on his death be liable to succession-duty, yet if the deceased has directed part of his estate to be invested in this country in trust for a person in liferent and for another in fee, the fund so settled, as a fund to be administered according to the law of Scotland exclusively, will be subject to succession-duty when the fiar's right to possession emerges on the death of the liferenter. Duncan's Trustee v. M'Cracken, March 20, 1888, p. 638.

REVOCATION. See Marriage-contract, 3—Succession, 7, 8.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Drainage improvements—Personal action against possessor of subjects—Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Act, 1856.

1. Held that the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company's Act of 1856 imposes no personal liability upon a landowner to whom advances are made under that Act, and that a personal action against such landowner for payment of the annual rent charge is incompetent. Scottish Drainage and Improvement Co. v. Campbell, Dec. 2, 1887, p. 108.

Public Harbour—Assignation of "works and property."

2. Statutory assignments for moneys borrowed by Harbour Trustees contained assignations to "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust, and the works and property of the trust." Held that the words "works and property of the trust" were of no practical effect, as it was obviously not contemplated by the Legislature to give a security which could not be made effectual without the use of real diligence. Greenock Harbour Trustees, Jan. 31, 1888, p. 343.

Preference—Uncompleted Security—Right to assignation of rates and duties.

3. The Greenock Harbour Trustees were authorised by their Acts to borrow money, and in security therefor to grant assignations of the rates and duties leviable by the trust. Some of the creditors of the trust held only interim receipts for their advances signed by the treasurer of the trust, with an undertaking that an assignment would afterwards be completed. The trustees became unable to meet all their liabilities. A question of preference between the holders of the statutory assignations and the holders of the interim receipts having arisen, held that creditors holding assignations granted in terms of the statute had a preference over the interim receipt holders, who held no statutory security. Greenock Harbour Trustees, Jan. 31, 1888, p. 343.

Ex facie absolute disposition—Back-bond—Reconveyance.

4. After an action had been raised against a person infeft in certain subjects on an ex facie absolute disposition, concluding for implement of certain obligations alleged to be contained in his title, he recorded a back-bond and executed a reconveyance of the subjects to his debtor and obtained decree in absence ordaining him to register it.

Question, whether the recording of the back-bond and the registration of the reconveyance operated a divestiture of the feudal title as in a question with the pursuer. Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co., June 19, 1888, p. 762.

Subject of security—" Parts, pertinents, and privileges thereof."

5. In 1878 the lessee of a theatre in Glasgow, holding letters-patent granted by the Crown (under the Act 43 Geo. III. c. 142) authorising him, "his executors, administrators, and assigns," to maintain a company of players in a certain theatre in Glasgow, or any other theatre in a suitable place in Glasgow, for a certain term of years, assigned the letters-patent to the proprietor of the theatre. Subsequently the proprietor granted a bond and disposition in security for £13,000, which conveyed the subjects with the "parts, pertinents, and privileges thereof." The bondholders having entered into possession, let the theatre to a new tenant. Their lessee having continued to produce stage plays, and having no licence to do so except in so far as he had right to the letters-patent, the proprietor brought an action against him and the bondholders to have them interdicted from producing stage plays in the theatre in virtue of the licence in the letters-patent, the right to which he maintained was still in him. The Court held that the pursuer had no title to sue, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young on the ground that the licence in the letters-patent was not a right of property separable from the theatre, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark on the ground that the pursuer had, by granting the bond and disposition in security, divested himself of his right to the letters-patent. Yuille v. Rushbury, July 4, 1888, p. 828.

Poinding of the ground—Assessments—Taxes Management Act, 1880, sec. 88 —Poor-Law Act, 1845, sec. 88.

6. Held that a collector of poor-rates had, under sec. 88 of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, and sec. 88 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, a preference over a heritable creditor who had obtained decree in an action of poinding of the ground.

7. A bleacher who was in embarrassed circumstances, being desirous to raise money, on 1st February 1886 entered into a "minute of sale" with his brother-in-law and son-in-law, which bore that in consideration of an advance of £400 by them, he sold to them absolutely certain pipes used for conveying water into his bleachfield, declaring that he should be entitled to use them so long as they considered proper on payment of a rent of £20 yearly. The pipes were worth much less than £400. The £400 was not instantly advanced, but the purchasers became parties to a cash-credit with a bank by means of which the bleacher drew out the £400 in instalments. On 5th August 1886 he executed a trust for creditors, without having paid the half year's rent due at Whitsunday for the pipes, and his trustee claimed them. Held that there had been a bona fide sale, and that the pipes were not part of the trust-estate. pursuer and the defender in an action for declarator of a public right of maintained alternative routes for a part of the road. It was proved ; the route proposed by the pursuer had been closed, without remonsıce by the public, for nearly thirty years, and there was no evidence t the one route was more convenient than the other. The Court declared

: right of way—Public termini—Maintenance by road trustees.
ıember of the public in 1886 sued for declarator of a right of way, ac-red by prescriptive use, for carriages, &c. over a road running westwards m a village, through the avenue of an estate, past a disused mill, which s not averred to be a public place, and on to join another alleged right way. It was proved that for many years prior to 1858 public money
l been expended on the maintenance of the road by the road trustees th the knowledge and occasionally at the request of the proprietor of the ıate. After that date no money had been so spent, the road having been ›sed to the public and maintained by the proprietor on being made the enue of the estate, and the road was not one of those scheduled and ken over by the road trustees under the provisions of the Roads and :idges Act, 1878. The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) negatived any right of ıy to the west of the old mill, but found that there was a right of way ɔm the village to a point "hereafter to be determined" near the old mill, ı the ground that by giving up the road to be maintained by the road ustees the proprietor had dedicated it to public uses. The Court (rersing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary) held that there was no evidence
: prescriptive use of a road from one public point to another, and that, on ıe assumption that the road had at one time been a district road under ıe management of the road trustees, on its abandonment by them it reverted › the proprietor free of any public right of way over it. Winans v. Lord weedmouth, March 10, 1888, p. 540.
lic right of way—Evidence of public use.
ı an action of declarator that there existed a public right of way for assengers on foot and on horseback, and for driving cattle and sheep through ıe Glen of the Doll in Forfarshire, it was proved that the pass formed the irect and natural access from Clova to Braemar, and that from time imıemorial there had existed a well-known and well-defined track through the len; that there had been a practice of drovers taking sheep by this track rom the public market at Braemar in spring and autumn to a public ıarket near Kirriemuir; that the track had been used by farmers in he district going to Clova or to Braemar, and occasionally by tourists ıoing between these places; that there had been a repute in the district, ›oth among the public and the proprietors of the ground over which the rack passed, that there was a public right of way. Held (aff. *judgment regard to the nature of the district, the use proved was sufficient in amount, ınd that it was to be attributed not to tolerance, but to the assertion of a

Warranty—Disconformity to Contract—Description—" Old Meldrum turnip seed."

2. A firm of seedsmen offered to take from W., N., & Co., a firm of wholesale merchants, 100 bushels of "Old Meldrum green top yellow turnip seed," if "of a really reliable stock." The merchants accepted the offer; the paper on which the acceptance was written bearing this notice:—"Terms of sale. —Messrs W., N., & Co. give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds they send out, and they will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned." The seed furnished turned out to be a mixture of Old Meldrum seed and that of another turnip, the two varieties of seed being quite indistinguishable. In consequence of this mixture the crops raised from the seed failed. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren), that the notice headed "Terms of sale" was effectual to protect the sellers against the buyers' claim for damages. SHERIFF. Jurisdiction—Action at instance of mother of bastard for custody.
1. Opinions as to the competency in the Sheriff Court of an action at the instance of a mother concluding for the custody of her bastard child. Brand v. Shaws, Feb. 24, 1888, p. 449.
Power of Sheriff to remit to Sheriff-substitute to pronounce decree—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 9-12.
2. It is incompetent for a Sheriff in an action raised under the Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, to remit to the Sheriff-substitute to pronounce decree. Bennet v. Wilson, June 9, 1888, p. 715.
Law-agent—Small-Debt Court—Small-Debt Act, 1837, secs. 14 and 15—Law-Agents Act, 1873, secs. 2, 13, and 16.
3. In a petition presented by an enrolled law-agent in a Sheriff Court for interdict against a person who was not an enrolled law-agent practising as a law-agent in the Small-Debt Court, held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) (1) that sec. 16 of the Law-Agents Act, 1873, had no application to persons allowed by the Sheriff to appear for others in the Small-Debt Court, and (2) that it was entirely within the discretion of the Sheriff to grant such leave to any person not an officer of Court. Milne v. Leslie, Feb. 29, 1888, p. 460.

SHIP. Seaworthiness—Charter-party—Exceptions—"Errors or negligence of navigation."
1. A charter-party of a steamship freed the owners from liability through the "act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and/or errors or negligence of navigation, of whatsoever nature and kind, during said voyage." The vessel was lost in consequence of the breakdown of her boiler through the presence of muddy water in it. In an action by the charterers against the shipowners for damages on account of the loss of the cargo, held (1) that it was proved that the muddy water had been put in the boiler before the commencement of the voyage; (2) (dub. Lord Young) that the presence of muddy water in the boiler when the ship started rendered her unseaworthy; and consequently (3) that the clause of exemption in the charter-party did not apply. Seville Sulphur and Copper Co., Limited, v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co., March 20, 1888, p. 616.
Bill of lading—Foreign—Proof.

the port of shipment, and pleaded that they were entitled to retain from freight the value of the deficiency, alleging that by Danish law (the law of the flag) the bill of lading was conclusive against the owners. After a proof, which shewed that the indorsees of the bill of lading had only agreed to pay for so much of the cargo as was delivered to them, held that the defenders had only become indorsees of the bill of lading to the extent of the cargo actually on board the vessel, and were not entitled to retain any part of the freight.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill) that the owners were only liable for the cargo actually put on board, and that by the law of Scotland, which as the law of the forum must regulate the proof, the bill of lading was not conclusive evidence as to the amount of cargo shipped. Owners of the "Immanuel" v. Denholm & Co., Dec. 7, 1887, p. 152.

Demurrage—Discharge of mixed cargo in separate lots—Custom of the port.

3. A ship, chartered to carry to the United Kingdom a cargo of ash and bones, the discharge of cargo to be according to the custom of the port of discharge, received from the charterers and loaded 33 tons of ash, about 397 tons of bones, and about 20 tons of horns, hoofs, and piths (which last were partly intermixed with the bones, and partly loaded on the top of them). The master granted bills of lading for 33 tons of ash and 417 tons of bones. On arrival at the port of call the ship was directed to proceed to Aberdeen. The master having on the demand of the consignees there, but under protest, separated the hoofs, horns, and piths from the bones before giving delivery, brought an action against the consignees for four days' demurrage on account of the delay caused by this separation. The defenders pleaded that the hoofs, horns, and piths having been loaded separately, ought to be so discharged, and that in any case the custom of the port of Aberdeen was that they should be separated from the bones by the ship before delivery. After a proof, from which it appeared, inter alia, that the trade in bones at Aberdeen was of only about thirty years' standing, and almost entirely in the hands of the defenders themselves, held (1) that the hoofs, horns, and piths had been tendered in bulk as part of a cargo of bones; (2) that delay had been caused by the separation; (3) that the defenders had failed to prove any custom of the port entitling them to require the ship to effect such separation; and therefore (4) that the pursuers were entitled to deliver the cargo in bulk as they received it, and to have decree for the sum sued for as demurrage. Clacevich v. Hutcheson & Co., Oct. 28, 1887, p. 11.

Salvage or towage services—Measure of award.

4. In approaching a port which had a very narrow entrance, a steam-vessel ran for about one-sixth of her length upon a bank composed of loose stones and mud, at that time under water, it being high tide. In answer to signals of distress a tug which was passing outside with a sailing-vessel in tow cast the vessel off, and at some risk, and with the loss of her hawser and other damage, requiring her detention for two days in port, drew the steam-ship off the bank. In an action by the tug-owners against the owners of the steam-ship for payment of £500 as salvage, the Lord Ordinary (Fraser), although of opinion that the steam-ship had not been in a position of serious danger, awarded £50. On a reclaiming note by the defenders the Court adhered, holding that whether the services rendered were proper salvage services or not, they were at least towage services of an extraordinary kind, and that the award was not excessive. Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co., June 14, 1888, p. 753.

Salvage—Expenses—Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 and 1862.

5. In a salvage case, in which the Lord Ordinary gave decree for £50 and certified under the above Acts that the case was one fit to be tried in a superior Court, the Court held that the certificate had been properly given.

SHIP—Continued.

Observed that the Inner-House will be slow to interfere with the exercise by the Lord Ordinary of his discretion in regard to the granting of such a certificate. Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co., June 14, 1888, p. 753.

Reparation—Liability for collision.

6. Where a ship is placed in a position of peril and difficulty by the wrong manœuvring of another ship, and her captain in exercising his best judgment for the safety of his vessel commits an error which causes or contributes to a collision between them, he will not be held in fault. Hine Brothers v. Clyde Trustees, March 7, 1888, p. 498.

SUCCESSION. Legacy—Direction to trustees to pay on event happening which did not take place.

1. By codicil to his will a testator left a legacy of £500, "which is to be handed over along with or at such time as legacies mentioned in clause D of this will are paid or handed over." The legacies in clause D were contingent on the testator surviving his mother, an event which did not occur. Held that the terms in which the direction was expressed did not import a condition into the legacy, and that the legatee was therefore entitled to payment. Grant v. Cowe, Nov. 18, 1887, p. 81.

Words importing bequest of heritage.

2. A testator left a holograph testamentary writing in these terms:—"In order to prevent all dispute after my death regarding the disposal of my property, I hereby leave and bequeath to my beloved wife the whole of the means and effects in my possession, or belonging to me at the time of my decease, to be absolutely at her disposal." At the date of the writing the testator had no heritable property but he subsequently acquired heritage. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Lee, diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the will carried the heritage. Forsyth v. Turnbull, Dec. 16, 1887, p. 172.

3. By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband conveyed to A, his intended wife, his whole household furniture and plenishing and the liferent use of a cottage, which belonged to him, along with the half of a plot of garden ground attached to it. He further took his heir bound to pay the wife an annuity of £15 out of certain other heritage belonging to him. He further gave his wife "full power and liberty, by mortis causa deed, to test upon and divide and apportion among my lawful children, whether by my first or this intended marriage, . . . my whole means and estate, . . . and to that end I hereby appoint the said A to be my executrix, with power to give up inventories of my estate, and all other powers competent to an executrix; and I hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to her as executrix foresaid." The husband died intestate shortly afterwards, leaving children by a former marriage only. In an action of declarator brought by the widow against the testator's heir-at-law to have it found that the pursuer was entitled to make up a title in trust to the heritable property, and that the defender, who was in possession, was bound to remove therefrom, held that the terms of the will did not express or imply an intention on the part of the testator to convey the heritage to her. Campbell v. Campbell, Nov. 30, 1887, p. 103.

Charitable Bequest—Uncertainty.

4. A person born in the royal burgh of Irvine died in 1859 leaving a testament dated in the same year, by which he bequeathed a sum "to the Magistrates and Town-Council of Irvine" to be applied toward the support of aged poor persons, natives of Irvine. Held that the bequest was not limited to persons born in the royal burgh of Irvine, but extended to those born within the parliamentary burgh as it existed in 1859. Magistrates of Irvine v. Muir, Feb. 9, 1888, p. 396.

Condition—Substitution—Protected substitution.

5. A testator, in 1841, disponed his whole estates, including heritage, to his two sisters, Ann and Margaret. In 1842 he, by codicil, on the narrative that his sister Ann was at present provided for, in so far altered his disposition as to dispone his whole property to his sister Margaret should Ann be still provided for at his death, but under condition that if Margaret should "marry or predecease my sister Ann, then, in the first case, she, Ann Lyon, shall receive the half, and in the second, the whole property, &c.; provided always that if both die without marrying, the property shall go in equal shares to my two brothers, George and David, or their heirs and successors." Both sisters survived the testator but died unmarried, Ann being the predeceaser, and Margaret leaving a settlement disposing, inter alia, of the whole heritable property of which she might die possessed. In a competition between the heirs under Margaret's settlement and the representatives of the testator's brothers, George and David, held that an absolute and in-defeasible fee in the heritable properties left by the testator was conferred on Margaret, with a simple destination in favour of the testator's brothers, George and David, their heirs and successors, which had been evacuated by Margaret's settlement. Lyon v. Lyon, Feb. 8, 1888, p. 394.

Accretion—Liferent—Residue.

6. A testatrix directed her trustees as soon as they should think expedient after her death to realise her estate, and to hold the proceeds thereof for behoof of her two sisters in liferent, and to pay over the annual proceeds to "them equally during their joint lives, and in the event of either of my said sisters predeceasing me, or upon the death of either of them after my decease, my trustees shall pay over one half of the said free proceeds or income to her children equally, share and share alike, if more than one, during the lifetime of the survivor of my said sisters, and the other half to such survivor." She further directed that after the death of the longest liver of her sisters "my trustees shall pay over and divide the whole free residue" of the estate to and among their children. Both sisters survived the testatrix, but one of them subsequently died leaving a child. After the death of the child the surviving sister claimed the liferent of the other half of the residue, on the ground that it accresced to her under the settlement, or alternatively she maintained that it fell into intestacy, and that she was entitled to it as heir in mobilibus to the testatrix. Held that it did not accresce to her, but that it fell to be accumulated with the capital of the residue, and to be divided among the nephews and nieces in terms of the deed. Stobie's Trustees, Jan. 27, 1888, p. 340.

Revocation—Conditio si sine liberis testator decesserit.

7. A lady by antenuptial contract settled certain specific funds on any children who might be born of the marriage, reserving to herself a power of bequeathing the trust-estate by will in the event of there being no child of the marriage who should attain twenty-one years of age (or, if a daughter, should marry). Ten days after the marriage she executed a settlement "pursuant to the power reserved" in the marriage-contract, bequeathing the residue of her property equally between her husband and sister. Two years after the marriage she succeeded to certain heritable estate from a brother. Shortly thereafter she gave birth to a child, one month after whose birth she died. The legatees contended that the marriage-contract and the will were to be read together as one settlement, and that as express provision had been made for children of the marriage the condition si sine liberis testator decesserit did not apply to the will. Held that the will was subject to the condition si sine liberis testator decesserit. Dobie's Trustee v. Pritchard, Oct. 19, 1887, p. 2.

Revocation—Testament and subsequent marriage-contract.

8. In 1879 a lady, then a widow, executed a settlement by which she conveyed her whole estates to executors, directing them to pay certain legacies, specific and general, and to divide the residue among three charitable institutions named. In 1886 she entered into a second marriage, and by antenuptial contract on the occasion of that marriage she, on her part, conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, then belonging to her, or which she might acquire during the subsistence of the marriage, to trustees, who were directed to hold the estate for her behoof in liferent, and to hold "the capital of the said estate for behoof of such person or persons and on such terms and payable at such periods as the second party may appoint by any writing under her hand, however informally executed, and failing such appointment the trustees shall hold the said capital for behoof of the second party's nearest heirs in mobilibus whomsoever." The lady died about a year after her marriage, survived by her husband, and leaving the settlement of 1879, but no other writing except the marriage-contract. The capital of the estate had been delivered to the marriage-contract trustees, but at her death the lady was in possession of a considerable accumulation of income, paid partly before and partly after her marriage, and of some jewellery and personal belongings. In a question between the beneficiaries under the deed of 1879 and the lady's heirs in mobilibus, as beneficiaries under the marriage-contract, held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) that the deed of 1879 was not effectual either as an independent settlement or as an appointment under the marriage-contract, but was absolutely revoked by the marriage-contract, which on a sound construction was to be taken as a settlement of the lady's entire estate as existing at her death, and that her heirs in mobilibus, as legatees under the marriage-contract, had right thereto. Bertram's Trustees v. Matheson's Trustee, March 10, 1888, p. 572.

Vesting—Effect of wife's repudiation of testamentary provisions by husband.

9. A truster directed his trustees to pay to his widow an annuity and to accumulate the balance of the income till her death, and "as soon after the death of my said wife as convenient," to distribute the estate among his children in a certain manner, declaring that if any of them should predecease the term of payment without leaving issue his or her share should fall into residue, which was to be divided among children surviving the term of payment and the issue of children predeceasing it. The widow repudiated her testamentary provisions and took her legal rights. Held, on a construction of the deed, that the object of the postponement of the distribution was the provision for the widow, and that this object having been defeated by her repudiation, the provisions for the children had vested a morte testatoris. Latta v. Muirhead, Dec. 23, 1887, p. 254.

Vesting—Marriage-contract.

10. In an antenuptial marriage-contract the husband bound himself to pay an annuity of £150 to his wife, if she survived him, and to pay £4000 to the children of the marriage at the first term after the death of the survivor of the spouses. In security of these provisions he bound himself to convey to trustees an insurance policy for £4000, declaring that if he should predecease his wife the trustees should have power to purchase an annuity of £150 for her, and that the children's provisions should in that event be restricted to the balance of the £4000, and be payable to them at majority or marriage. It was further provided that in the event of there being no children, or of all predeceasing the survivor of the spouses, without lawful issue, the sum should be held for the husband's own heirs and assignees. There were children of the marriage, which was dissolved by the death of the husband. Held that the right of the children vested at the husband's death. Murray's Trustees v. Bloxsom's Trustees, Dec. 22, 1887, p. 233.

Vesting—Parent and Child—Payment to father for behoof of pupil children —Alimentary provision.

11. A testatrix directed her trustees to "hold and apply, pay, divide, and convey" the residue of her estate to and for behoof of her lawful children, the lawful issue of a predeceasing child being entitled to the interest which such child would have taken had it survived; "declaring that the provisions, so far as in favour of or descending upon females," should be purely alimentary, and exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husbands they might marry. She further directed the trustees to hold the income of the children's shares, or such part as the trustees should think necessary, for the education and maintenance of the children, "and to retain the capital in their own hands under the trust hereby constituted until they can pay it over to trustees under a marriage-contract, or otherwise, appointed by my children respectively, under trust which shall prescribe that the said income and produce shall be alimentary for my said children and the capital provided to their issue; declaring that my said trustees and executors shall only be effectually discharged by the trustees under such last-mentioned trusts." The testatrix left three daughters. One of them predeceased her leaving a son and daughter, who were in pupillarity. Held (1) that the share which would have belonged to the predeceasing daughter if she had survived vested in her children at the death of the testatrix; (2) that so far as it belonged to the granddaughter it could not be regarded as alimentary; and (3) that the father of the pupils, as their tutor and administrator, was entitled to receive and discharge it, and the trustees of the testatrix were bound to pay it over to him on his receipt. Murray's Trustees v. Bloxsom's Trustees, Dec. 22, 1887, p. 233.

Vesting—Term of payment.

12. Terms of deed on which held (1) that a declaration that shares of residue should not vest till the time of payment should have arrived implied a declaration that vesting should then take place; (2) that by the time of payment the testator meant the time when the residue fell to be divided; and (3) that a direction that the shares of pupils and of unmarried minors should be retained till their marriage or majority did not suspend vesting. Hunter's Trustees v. Hunter, Feb. 9, 1888, p. 399.

Election—Provisions of father's settlement in lieu of marriage-contract provision to child.

13. A father in the marriage-contract of his daughter directed trustees, who held for him a policy for £3000 on his life, to assign it, to the extent of £2000, to the marriage-contract trustees for behoof of the daughter in liferent and her children in fee, and bound himself to pay the premiums during his life, and, failing his doing so, to pay to the marriage-contract trustees the sum of £2000 at the first term after his death. This and other provisions were declared to be in full of all the daughter could claim from her father's estate, except such provisions as he might make of his own free will by deed of settlement or otherwise. The policy was never assigned to the marriage-contract trustees. The father continued to pay the premiums till his death. He died leaving a settlement by which he directed one-third of the residue of his estate to be held for behoof of the daughter in liferent and her children in fee, declaring that the provisions for her should be in full of all his obligations under her marriage-contract remaining unimplemented, "which provisions shall by acceptance of the provisions hereunder be held to have been discharged." Held that if the daughter and her husband took the share of the residue, they were not entitled to any part of the policy fund. Crum Ewing's Trustees v. Bayly's Trustees, March 8, 1888, p. 507.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Infeftment in trust—Radical right—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4.

1. In 1836 the heir then in possession of an estate under a fee-simple destination, dated in 1783, in favour of a series of heirs varying in some respects from the legal order of succession, on the narrative that he had resolved to execute a new settlement of his lands and estate, conveyed, mortis causa, the estate to his children nominatim and to the survivors or survivor of them in trust for the purpose of managing the estate and of dividing the rents among themselves so long as one or more of them existed, and at the termination of the trust "then to and in favour of my heir-at-law at that time in fee." It was further provided, that if it should happen that the last survivor of the children was also the truster's heir-at-law, then, or if that event should not happen, then on the death of that last survivor, the trust should come to an end, and the subjects fall and belong to the truster's heir-at-law at the time of that event. The trustees were further given ordinary powers of administration, but they were prohibited from burdening or selling the subjects. On the death of the granter in 1852 A, his eldest son, completed his title by precept of clare constat as heir of provision to his father under the deed of 1783. The trustees were also infeft under this trust-disposition in terms of the precept contained in the deed, which directed sasine to be given to them, "in trust as trustees for the ends and purposes, and under the declarations, burdens, conditions, and provisions before specified, and upon the termination of this trust . . . then to my heir-at-law at that time in fee." A having died in 1875, the superior brought an action against the sole surviving trustee under the deed of 1836, concluding for declarator that on A's death a casualty of a year's rent became due by the defender as a singular successor of the last vassal and impliedly entered with the superior in virtue of the 4th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. Held that the trust which was created by the deed of 1836 was purely temporary in its nature, and a mere burden on the fee of the estate, which was vested on A, and on A's death passed into his hereditas jacens.

In another action by the superior founding upon a mortis causa disposition of other subjects granted by the vassal of even date with the former, where the trustees were empowered to sell the subjects conveyed for the benefit of creditors, with a direction, in the event of any of the lands remaining unsold, to convey them to the testamentary trustees in similar terms with the first, a similar judgment was pronounced. Lord Home v. Lyell, Dec. 20, 1887, p. 193.

Redemption of Casualty—Act 1469, c. 36—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 15.

2. A vassal disponed a piece of pasture ground for building purposes in consideration of a ground-annual. The purchaser before building tendered to the superior the redemption price of the casualties of superiority which were untaxed, calculated on the agricultural rent of the land. The superior maintained that the price ought to be calculated on the annual value of the land as building ground. Held that the yearly maill of the subjects at the date, as defined by the Act 1469, cap. 36, was their agricultural value. School Board of Neilston v. Graham, Nov. 16, 1887, p. 44.

Personal or real—Ground-annual—Obligation to build within a certain period —Liability of singular successor.

3. A, a vassal under a feu-contract conveyed part of his feu by contract of ground-annual to B, with and under the burdens and conditions contained in the feu-contract, and further under an obligation to erect certain buildings on the ground within one year from the term of entry, in order to secure payment of the ground-annual and of the share of the feu-duty, &c. which had been allocated upon the ground disponed, and to maintain the buildings in good order and repair in all time. B bound himself and "his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, and his assignees," to perform these conditions, and they were declared to be real burdens upon the subjects disponed, and appointed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines. B subsequently disponed the subjects to C, and six years after the date of the contract of ground-annual C disponed them to D, the disposition being in each case "with and under the real liens and burdens, conditions, provisions, and others specified and contained in said contract of ground-annual."

The trustee upon A's sequestrated estate having raised an action against D, to have it found that he was bound to implement the obligations in the feu-contract, and the obligation in the contract of ground-annual, as to the erection and subsequent maintenance of buildings, held (1) that as the pursuer was not a party to the feu-contract he had no title to sue upon it; and (2) that in so far as the contract of ground-annual was concerned it imposed no personal obligation to erect buildings which was enforceable against a singular successor in the lands, and defender therefore assoilzied.

Question, whether the obligation to erect buildings contained in the contract of ground-annual could be made effectual as a real burden. Marshall's Trustee v. Macneill & Co., June 19, 1888, p. 762.

Building restrictions—Common feuing plan—Loss of plan—Proof—Onus.

4. A feu-charter, dated in 1825, providing for the erection of a tenement in a town, declared that it should not be in the power of the feuar to make any deviation from or alteration of a plan of the tenement, signed as relative to the feu-charter, "all which it is hereby specially provided may be stopped, demolished, or removed by us or our foresaids, or by any of the feuars of the said street, at the expense of the feuars offending." The tenement was erected in 1826. In 1887 the proprietor proposed to bring forward the front of the tenement to the line of the street by covering the area. Neighbouring feuars, with a title to object, objected on the ground that the proposed alteration was a deviation from the plan, but the plan itself was lost. Held that, as it was to be presumed that the existing buildings had been erected in conformity with the plan, the onus lay upon the proprietor to shew that the alterations proposed by him were not disconform to the plan. Sutherland v. Barbour, Nov. 17, 1887, p. 62.

Building restrictions.

5. By feu-contract dated in 1855, Allan, the vassal, bound himself to erect two villas of specified dimensions and style, and Dixon, the superior, bound himself to take the whole feuars of the remaining portions of his estate bound in similar terms, and to insert in their feu-rights the like clauses with reference to the erection of buildings. These obligations were appointed to be inserted in the infeftment, and to be validly referred to in all future conveyances of the feu. In 1862 Dixon granted a feu to Hunter by a feu-contract which contained clauses obliging him to erect villas only, and obliging the superior to take the feuars of the ground "immediately adjoining to the north" similarly bound. In 1883 Allan and Dixon executed a deed by which they discharged each other of the foregoing obligations, and in the same year Dixon feued to Allan an additional piece of ground to the north of Hunter's feu, but not adjoining it, under a contract which permitted the erection of tenements of dwelling-houses and shops. In 1887 Allan presented a petition to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect tenements of dwelling-houses in flats and shops on his additional feu. The petition was opposed by Hunter, who objected to the erection of tenements and shops, founding, in the first place, on the feu-contract of 1855, which he maintained created a jus quæsitum in favour of the other feuars, rendering the unrestricted title of 1883 null, and, in the second place, on his own title. Held that Allan's title was not subject to any restrictions in favour of Hunter, and that as it was not alleged that he had taken it in the knowledge that it was in violation of any obligation by the superior in favour of Hunter, he was entitled to obtain the authority craved. Walker & Dick v. Park, Feb. 29, 1888, p. 477.

Building restrictions—Self-contained house.

6. The proprietor of a piece of ground fronting a street in which the buildings were of various descriptions, feued it by one feu-contract to one person in four building lots, a separate feu-duty being attached to each. The feu-contract prohibited the feuar from erecting or maintaining on the four lots feued any other building than one villa on each lot, and provided that "each of the said villa dwelling-houses shall be detached from the others, and shall be self-contained and occupied by one tenant only." This provision was declared to be a real burden, to be inserted or referred to in any subsequent dispositions or conveyances. A villa for the occupation of a single tenant was thereafter erected on each lot. The villas and lots were subsequently disponed to different persons (the above provision being incorporated in the dispositions). A petition to the Dean of Guild by one of the disponees for authority to alter his villa by erecting an outside stair for the upper floors and cutting off communication between them and the lower floor was opposed by another disponee. The superior was cited, but did not appear. Held, on appeal from the judgment of the Dean of Guild—(1) (following Buchanan v. Marr, June 7, 1883, 10 R. 936) that the proposed alteration being an alteration which would not preclude the villa being occupied by a single family, it did not involve a contravention of the feu-contract; and (2) per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young, that even if there were, the objector was not in titulo to object. Miller v. Carmichael, July 19, 1888, p. 991.

See School, 2.

TEINDS. Over and under-paying heritors—Prescription.

1. Held that although in general prescription does not begin to run against a claim for repayment by an overpaying heritor in a locality against an underpaying heritor until a final decree of locality has been pronounced, it did operate where the overpayments by the heritor were caused by his own act in failing to produce a decree of valuation. Earl of Fife v. Duff, Dec. 23, 1887, p. 238.

Valuation—Cumulo or several—Division.

2. In a decree of valuation of, inter alia, the teinds of the lands and barony of K, comprehending the lands of A, B, C, D, and E, with the pertinents, the rent, stock, and teind of these lands was declared to be £157, 6s. $0^{4}/_{12}$d. sterling, the fifth part whereof being £31, 9s. $2^{5}/_{12}$d., was declared to be teind, and the usual decerniture followed. In the extract of the decree, which was in the old form, it was set forth that the decerniture proceeded upon a report by the Lord Ordinary, and conform to a particular scheme of the rental, stock, and teind of the lands, and this scheme was narrated ad longum. From this scheme it was possible to ascertain the rental, and the particular deductions, and so to arrive accurately at the teind of each separate parcel of land making up the lands and barony of K. In a question arising as to the surplus teinds of D and E—two of these several parcels—which had been disjoined and erected into a new parish quoad omnia, held that, as regarded the lands and barony of K, the valuation was a cumulo valuation, and that it was not competent to look beyond the decerniture for the purpose of ascertaining the several valuation of the teinds of D and E. Lord Advocate v. Stirling, Feb. 10, 1888, p. 424.

Cumulo valuation—Disjunction quoad omnia of part of lands—Surplus teind.

3. The teinds of the lands of K, in the parish of X, comprehending the lands of A, B, C, D, and E, with the pertinents, were valued in cumulo. D and E were afterwards disjoined, and erected into the parish of Y quoad omnia. In the locality of Y the teinds of D and E, as ascertained for the purposes of the locality, from data contained in the extract of the old decree of valuation, without process of division of the cumulo valuation, were exhausted. In consequence of the stipend having been modified in a year when the fiars prices were abnormally low, the heritor's subsequent payments from these teinds to the minister of Y considerably exceeded the valued teind on which the locality proceeded. He continued, however, to pay without surrendering to the minister of Y. In the parish of X, on the assumption that the teinds of the lands of A, B, and C were severally ascertained on the same basis, there was surplus teind. Held that the valuation of the teinds of the lands of K being a cumulo valuation, and no formal process of division having been brought, the titular was only entitled to claim surplus teind from the whole lands of K, after deducting the stipend paid in both the parishes of X and Y, and was not entitled to claim the surplus teind of the lands of A, B, and C, parts of the lands of K remaining in the parish of X, after deducting only the stipend paid to the minister of the parish of X. Lord Advocate v. Stirling, Feb. 10, 1888, p. 424.

Subvaluation—Dereliction.

4. Mere lapse of time is no bar to a subvaluation of teinds being approved, the right to obtain approbation being res meræ facultatis.

A subvaluation of teinds will not be held to be derelinquished unless there is evidence of an intention to abandon it.

Overpayments of stipend will not be evidence of the abandonment of a subvaluation if it appear that at the time of the overpayments the heritor making them was ignorant of the existence of the subvaluation. Lord Elibank's Trustees v. Hart, July 16, 1888, p. 927.

common law to prevent persons fishing in a manner alleged to be illegal, held that the complainers, being merely a statutory board with statutory remedies, had no title to sue. Tay District Fishery Board v. Robertson, Nov. 16, 1887, p. 40.

Decree for expenses—Assignation.

2. A defender obtained a decree for expenses against the pursuer, and thereafter assigned his interest therein to a third party. The assignee raised an action for the amount of the expenses against persons who were not named in the decree, averring that they had been the true domini litis in the former action. Held (reversing judgment of Lord Lee, Ordinary) that he had no title to sue. Rose v. Stevenson, Jan. 27, 1888, p. 336.

Action for custody of bastard child—Personal and intransmissible.

3. Held that an action at the instance of a mother for custody of her bastard child could not be insisted in after her death by a person named by her in a testament as "tutor, curator, and guardian" to her child. Brand v. Shaws, Feb. 24, 1888, p. 449.

Inhibition—Trust.

4. When a heritable bond is granted in favour of certain persons as trustees, the assignation of the beneficial interest to other persons does not affect the title of the trustees to use inhibition in their own names against the debtor in the bond. Clarke v. M'Nab, March 10, 1888, p. 569.

Company—Shareholder.

5. Title of an original shareholder of a company to sue the vendor of company estate for damages on the ground that he had been induced to become a shareholder through the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defender. Dunnett v. Mitchell, Dec. 7, 1887, p. 131.

Law-agent to trust—Beneficiaries.

6. Title of beneficiaries, with a contingent interest merely, to sue action against the law-agent to the trust to have him ordained to restore trust-funds alleged to have been lost through illegal investment. Rae v. Meek, July 20, 1888, p. 1033.

TRADE NAME. Interdict.

In order to entitle a wholesale dealer to interdict against a retail dealer selling over his counter goods on the representation that they are of the pursuer's manufacture, when in point of fact they are not, it is not sufficient to prove that in a few instances, when goods of the pursuer's manufacture were asked for, other goods were supplied. Thomson & Co. v. Robertson, July 12, 1888, p. 880.

TRUST. Foreign—Jurisdiction.

1. A person carrying on business in Scotland granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors to two trustees, one of whom resided in Scotland and the other in England. In an action of accounting raised in Scotland against both trustees, the trustee residing in England pleaded no jurisdiction. The Court repelled the plea, on the ground that the trust-estate was in Scotland. Robertson's Trustee v. Nicholson, July 13, 1888, p. 914.

Adjudication—Diligence against trust-estate for expenses of litigation.

2. Held competent to adjudge a trust-estate for expenses decerned for against the trustees in a litigation in which the trust-estate was alone concerned. Stewart v. Forbes, Feb. 8, 1888, p. 383.

Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 166.

Administration—Authority to sell—Judicial Factor.

4. A trust-deed conferred upon the trustees a power of sale, either by public roup or by private bargain. A judicial factor, who had been appointed on the estate, applied, under the Trusts Acts, 1867 and 1884, for authority to sell privately for £2100 certain feuing ground belonging to the estate, which at that time yielded £18 a-year. The liferenter approved of the proposed sale, but the fiar objected, and urged delay until the demand for building ground improved. After a report from men of skill that the offer should be accepted, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) granted the prayer of the petition. On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and refused the petition, on the ground that the proposed sale might be prejudicial to the interests of the fiar. Molleson v. Hope, May 26, 1888, p. 665.

Administration—Inhibition—Title to sue.

5. When a heritable bond is granted in favour of certain persons as trustees, the assignation of the beneficial interest to other persons does not affect the title of the trustees to use inhibition in their own names against the debtor in the bond. Clarke v. M'Nab, March 10, 1888, p. 569.

Administration—Title to sue.

6. In a multiplepoinding brought by testamentary trustees for the distribution of an estate, one of the beneficiaries stated as an objection to the condescendence of the fund in medio that it did not include a sum of £600 said to be due to the estate by one of the trustees. In answer the trustees produced a discharge granted by the truster to the alleged debtor, and explained that they were satisfied they could not prosecute the claim with any hope of success, but they offered to allow the objector to sue in their names on his finding security for the expenses of the proceedings. The Court repelled the objection, holding that this was all the trustees could be required to do. Brown's Trustees v. Brown, March 13, 1888, p. 581.

Administration—Nobile officium—Allowances to minor children.

7. A testator left a heritable estate, the rental of which was £900 a-year, settled upon his only son in liferent and his children in fee. Of the income of the personal estate, which was £4600, the son received annually about £2300 as an alimentary payment for the support of himself, his wife, and children, the remaining £2300 of income being accumulated by the trustees for the children. In a petition at the son's instance, asking that the trustees should be ordained to contribute out of the free annual income for the suitable education and maintenance of the children (of whom there were seven under nineteen years of age), the Court authorised the trustees to pay a sum equal to one-half of the cost of such education in each year, including board when from home, and travelling expenses, the payment by the trustees not to exceed £500 in any one year. Muir v. Muir's Trustees, Dec. 10, 1887, p. 170.

Administration—Investments—Personal liability of trustee.

8. Circumstances in which a gratuitous trustee was found personally liable for trust-funds lent by him on the security of heritable subjects.

Observed that where trust moneys are lent on the security of heritable subjects, if any part thereof is in the occupation of the owner the trustee ought to take that fact into consideration in estimating the amount of the rental available for payment of interest on the loan.

Observed that where the primary purpose of a trust is to secure an alimentary provision, the trustee is bound to be specially careful that the security is sufficient to ensure payment of the interest on the loan. Maclean v. Soady's Trustee, July 19, 1888, p. 966.

9. A marriage-contract empowered the trustees acting under it (two of whom were the spouses) to lend on, inter alia, heritable securities, or personal securities or obligations, and declared that the trustees should not be answerable "for errors, omissions, or neglect of diligence, nor for the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases." The greater part of the trust funds were lent by the trustees on the security of buildings in the course of erection, the rents of which, after their completion, turned out to be wholly insufficient to meet the interest on the loan, and the borrower became bankrupt. While both spouses were alive the children of the marriage, whose interest under the contract was during the marriage contingent merely, brought an action against the trustees and the law-agent to the trust, "conjunctly and severally, or severally, or in such other way or manner as should seem just," to have them ordained to restore the money to the trust. The law-agent and one of the trustees lodged defences. The Court—while unanimously of opinion that the security was one which ought not to have been accepted by trustees—(diss. Lord Mure, Lord Shand, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark) assoilzied the trustee, and (diss. Lord Young) assoilzied the law-agents.

The Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lord Adam held that gratuitous trustees are only liable for such diligence, prudence, and knowledge as they actually possess in the management of their own business, and that, judged by this standard, the evidence shewed there had been no negligence on the part of the trustee.

Lord Young held that the trustee was not liable, as he had acted on what he considered the best advice, that of the law-agent.

Lord Mure, Lord Shand, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark were of opinion that gratuitous trustees must shew the same reasonable care that a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own business, and that the trustee was liable, as the evidence shewed he had failed in this.

Opinion (per the Lord President) that the indemnity clause in the marriage-contract protected the trustee—Opinions contra per Lords Mure, Shand, and Young. Rae v. Meek, July 20, 1888, p. 1033.

10. Testamentary trustees who had power to invest the trust funds "in any of the Government securities, or upon heritable security in Scotland, or in such other way, or on such other securities as my trustees shall think proper," and who were declared not to be liable "for loss or depreciation in the investments of the trust funds," (1) lent part of the trust funds on deposit-receipt to a heritable security company; and (2) with another portion purchased fully paid-up stock of a limited company. There was a loss on both transactions. Held (aff. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the first was an investment within the powers of the trustees, and that they were not liable for loss upon it, but (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the second was not an investment but the employment of the trust funds in a trading company of which the trustees thereby became partners, and that they were liable for the loss of funds so employed. Ritchies v. Ritchie's Trustees, July 20, 1888, p. 1086.

11. Circumstances in which family trustees, with the fullest powers of investment on such securities, heritable or personal, as they should think proper, were made liable for the loss of a sum lent to a member of the family on insufficient security.

Opinion (per Lord Watson) that there is no rule in the law of Scotland that the responsibility of a gratuitous trustee must (apart from any special dispensation by the truster) be tested by reference, not to an average standard, but to the degree of care and prudence which he uses in the management of his own private affairs.

Opinion further (per Lord Watson) that trustees authorised to lend on personal security are not justified in doing so unless they cannot find a safer investment. Knox v. Mackinnon, August 7, 1888, H. L., p. 83.

Administration—Payments ultra vires—Acquiescence of beneficiary.

12. Spouses raised an action against the trustees under their marriage-contract for repayment, with interest, of sums expended out of the wife's estate on the ground that the payments were ultra vires of the trustees. Held that, even assuming the payments to have been ultra vires, the action was barred by the fact that the wife had been a party to an agreement which embodied a settlement of the whole transaction.

Opinion (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that the question was one not between beneficiary and trustee, but between truster and trustee, and that the wife being in the position of a truster, and having been in the knowledge of the action of the trustees, was not entitled to dispute it afterwards. Spence v. Boyd, Feb. 7, 1888, p. 376.

Administration—Borrowing ultra vires.

13. Circumstances in which held that while trustees had acted ultra vires in borrowing money to pay debt the beneficiaries had sustained no loss, and trustees therefore assoilzied. Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees, Feb. 10, 1888, p. 417.

Administration—Loan by trustees to one of their number.

14. Trustees advanced part of the trust funds to the liferenter—one of their number—on the security of a house which he was erecting for his occupation. Held that the transaction was ultra vires, and that the trustees were bound to replace the funds so lent. Ritchies v. Ritchie's Trustees, July 20, 1888, p. 1086.

Parent and child—Separate maintenance of child.

15. A truster directed his trustees to pay to his wife, if she survived him, a certain annuity, and to permit her to have the occupation during her lifetime of a dwelling-house and the use of the furniture therein, declaring that she "shall out of the foresaid provisions educate and maintain my children . . . in a way befitting their station in life, until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years or, if daughters, be married." He was survived by his wife and by several sons and daughters of that and of a prior marriage. The settlement left undisposed of part of the income and most of the capital of his estate, which was of considerable amount. Held that one of the daughters of the first marriage, who was over twenty-one years of age and desired to live apart from the widow, was not entitled under the settlement to a separate maintenance out of the widow's annuity, it being sufficient implement of the widow's obligation that she offered to maintain the daughter in family with her in the dwelling-house left by the truster. Barry's Trustees v. Barry, March 2, 1888, p. 496.

Denuding—Renunciation of alimentary liferent—Marriage-contract.

16. By antenuptial marriage-contract trustees were directed to pay the income of the trust-estate (which amounted to £18,500, £16,000 being contributed by the husband's father, and £2500 by the wife) to the spouses during the subsistence of the marriage, and to the husband in the event of his wife's death. The income was declared to be "strictly alimentary." After the death of both spouses, if one child survived, he or she was to get £10,000 of the capital; if two survived, they were to get £12,000; if more, they were to get the whole. It was further provided that in the event of only one or two children surviving, "the residue of said trust capital shall be at the disposal of" the husband "or his heirs, executors, or assignees." Failing surviving children, the whole capital was to be paid over to the representatives of the spouses in the proportions advanced by or for them. After the death of the wife, and there being only two children of the marriage surviving the husband called upon the trustees to denude of the trust funds, in so far as they exceeded £12,000, upon his renouncing and discharging his liferent of the surplus. In a special case, held that the trustees were not entitled or bound to denude.

Question, whether if the children had consented to take immediate payment of their provisions the trustees could have refused to denude. Montgomery's Trustees v. Montgomery, Feb. 2, 1888, p. 369.

17. In 1866 the funds realised by a charitable bazaar were appropriated in part to the establishment of a convalescent fever home in connection with the Royal Infirmary, Glasgow, which was at that time the only institution in the city for treating fever patients. Thereafter the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, as Local Authority for the city, established a fever hospital for the city, and the Royal Infirmary ceased to treat fever patients. Direction

18. Circumstances in which it was held that a church which had belonged to the "Licensed Episcopal" congregation of a town (which had for many years ceased to exist), fell to be made over to the "Scottish Episcopal" congregation of the town. Burnett v. St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Brechin, June 12, 1888, p. 723.

Charitable trust—Administration—Discretion of trustees.

19. A truster directed his trustees to hold his estates, which were heritable, and apply the free yearly revenue thereof "for preserving the aged and infirm among the descendants of my father from want, or from the necessity of applying for public relief, and for obtaining for the young among the said descendants, boys and girls, such a good, sound, plain, and useful education as will enable them to earn a livelihood for themselves, . . . with power . . . to maintain the young among the said descendants either in family with their parents or otherwise while at their education, . . . "; declaring that the trustees should not be entitled to spend more than £20 annually for the relief of any one beneficiary, "and that only while, in the judgment of my said trustees, he or she stands in need of it in supplement of his or her own exertions." The truster directed the surplus revenue to be divided among certain of his relatives and their representatives per stirpes. At a time when the trustees, assumed and acting in the trust, were among the persons interested in the surplus revenue being as large as possible, a descendant of the truster's father, who was a widow with six children under seventeen, applied for assistance from the trust. The revenue of the trust exceeded £500, less than £50 of which was expended on descendants of the truster's father, the remainder having been applied as surplus revenue. The trustees offered the applicant 12s. 6d. per week, with school fees and boots for the four youngest children, and to pay a debt she had incurred for rent, amounting to £6. The Court held that this allowance was in the circumstances inadequate, and directed the trustees to make an allowance of £10 per annum for each of the six children, reserving to the parties to apply to the Court to alter the allowance in the event of any change of circumstances. Thomson v. Davidson's Trustees, June 9, 1888, p. 719.

Educational trust—Superior and Vassal—Educational Endowments Act, 1882—Scope of Act.

20. Scheme framed by the Commissioners under the above Act held not to be within the scope of the statute, as the subjects had not been "dedicated to charitable uses," the feu-contract under which they were held allowing them to be applied to other purposes. Magistrates of Greenock v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments, Feb. 24, 1888, p. 440.

Valuation Acts. Appeal—Competency.

1. The Lands Valuation Act, 1854, enacts that any person whose name is entered by the assessor in the Valuation-roll shall be entitled to appeal to the Commissioners with reference to such entry, provided the appellant shall intimate in writing that he is to maintain the appeal, and "specify the amount of valuation which he alleges should be substituted for that stated by the assessor." The proprietor of K intimated in writing to the assessor "an appeal against your entering in the Valuation-roll the shootings of K at £5," and added that the lands were not shot over, and that if the shootings were let as assessed the rent of the lands would be diminished to a very much larger extent. Before writing the letter he had stated to the assessor verbally that he objected to the shootings being entered in the Valuation-roll at all. Held that there had been sufficient intimation of an appeal against the shootings being entered in the roll. Maitland v. Assessor for Midlothian, March 15, 1888, p. 592.

2. The titles of a vassal reserved to the superior the coal in the lands feued, but gave the vassal the right to prevent the coal from being worked except on the "stoop-and-room" system, one object of which was to provide against the subsidence of the surface. The vassal entered into an agreement with the lessee of the coal under which, in return for annual payments, the amount of which was to be regulated by the coal won, the lessee became entitled to work the coal on the "longwall" or complete excavation system. Held that the vassal did not fall to be entered in the Valuation-roll as proprietor of collieries in respect of such payments. Assessor for Fifeshire v. Curror, March 20, 1888, p. 632.

Shootings—Unlet deer forest—Sporting Lands Rating Act, 1886, secs. 6 and 7.

3. Lands in the occupation of the proprietor were used as a deer forest only, there being neither other game nor farm stock thereon. Held, per Lord Fraser (agreeing with the determination of the Valuation Committee), that the lands fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll at their value as a deer forest only; per Lord Lee, that looking particularly to the terms of the Sporting Lands Rating Act, 1886, secs. 6 and 7, there ought to be a double entry of the lands at their value as grazing ground, and at their value as a deer forest. The Judges being divided in opinion, the determination of the Valuation Committee stood. Assessor for Argyllshire v. Stuart, March 15, 1888, p. 588.

Mines and Minerals—Lands Valuation Act, 1854, sec. 42.

4. A freestone quarry was let on a lease for eight years from Martinmas 1885, with a break in favour of the tenant at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after Martinmas 1886, at a fixed rent of £100, or a lordship in the option of the landlord. The tenant did not enter into possession till after the Valuation-roll for 1885-6 had been made up, and the quarry was not entered for that year. It was entered at £100 for 1886-7, in terms of the landlord's return. The lordship paid at Whitsunday 1886 was £92, 10s., and at Martinmas 1886 £89, 10s. The quarry ceased to be worked at Martinmas 1886, but the tenant remained in possession till Whitsunday 1887, when he took advantage of the break and brought the lease to an end. The excavations were filled up, and the ground restored. At Whitsunday 1887 the tenant paid the half-yearly fixed rent of £50. He had thus paid in all £232, but only £100 of that having been entered in the Valuation-roll, the assessor entered the balance of £132 in the roll for 1887-8, although the quarry had not been worked and nothing had been paid during that year. Held that under the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, sec. 42, the valuation was wrong. Lord Elphinstone v. Assessor for Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, March 20, 1888, p. 637.

Farm let for part of year as grazings and otherwise unlet.

5. A farm which was entirely laid out in grass was let annually for part of the year—from Whitsunday to Martinmas—as grazings, and during the rest of the year was in the proprietor's own hands. For the year 1887 the rent of the grazings was £301, and the valuation of the farm as fixed by the Valuation Committee £400. On appeal, held per Lord Lee that the valuation of the Valuation Committee was right, per Lord Fraser that the valuation ought to be reduced to £301, the rent received for the grazings. The Judges being divided in opinion, the valuation stood. Berwick v. Assessor for Fifeshire, March 20, 1888, p. 629.

Method of valuation—Hydropathic Establishment—Proof—Competency of compelling proprietor and occupant to disclose his profits—Valuation Act, 1854, sec. 10.

6. The valuation (on the basis of capital cost) of a hydropathic establishment in the occupation of its proprietor reduced, on a comparison with the valuation of similar establishments throughout Scotland, from £1120 to £850.

Opinion (per Lord Fraser) that the proper method of valuing such an establishment, when in the occupation of its proprietor, was to ascertain the profits which he made, and that under the 10th section of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, he might be compelled to disclose these profits, and to produce his books.

Opinion on this point reserved by Lord Lee. Philp v. Assessor for Rothesay, March 20, 1888, p. 627.

County Assessor or Assessor of Railways and Canals—Lands acquired for purposes of a railway but not yet so used.

7. In an appeal against a determination of the Valuation Committee sustaining a valuation by the assessor for the county of certain ground which had been acquired by a railway company (whose line was partly constructed) for the purposes of their undertaking, but which was still in grass and in no way used for these purposes, held per Lord Lee, that the ground had rightly been valued by the county assessor and not by the assessor for railways and canals, notwithstanding a provision of the company's Act of Parliament that the lands from time to time acquired by the company should, "for all purposes of tolls, rates, and charges, and for all other purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company"; held per Lord Fraser contra, that the ground in question ought to have been valued by the assessor for railways and canals as part of the undertaking of the company. The Judges being divided in opinion, the valuation stood. Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. Assessor for Linlithgowshire, March 15, 1888, p. 595.

Burgh Assessor or Assessor of Railways and Canals—Railway bookstall.

8. Held that the bookstall in a railway station, in the occupation of newsagents who paid the company a fixed sum annually for the privilege of supplying newspapers and books within the station, but who supplied not only passengers travelling on the railway but inhabitants of the town with newspapers and books, had been properly valued by the assessor of railways and canals as part of the undertaking of the company, and did not fall to be separately entered by the burgh assessor in his roll. Callander and Oban Railway Co. v. Assessor for Oban, March 20, 1888, p. 634.

WRIT. Testament—Signature on erasure—Onus.

Where in a testamentary deed the signature bearing to be that of the testator was written on an erasure, but was otherwise ex facie duly tested, and the deed was challenged as vitiated in essentialibus, held that the deed was ex facie probative, and that the onus was consequently on the party challenging it to prove either that the signature was not genuine, or, if genuine, that it had not been duly tested. The proof on these points having failed, deed sustained. Brown v. Duncan, March 9, 1888, p. 511.
